Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the following Senators are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency: The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY].

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR NEW JERSEY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1335) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge for the district of New Jersey.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the amendment?

Mr. HEBERT. The bill provides for the appointment of an additional district judge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, I understand; but the amendment of the House has not been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a judge to fill a vacancy in the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, occasioned by the death of Hon. William A. Runyon, who was appointed as additional judge in said district under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled 'An act for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the fourth judicial circuit, for the appointment of additional district judges for certain districts, providing for an annual conference of certain judges, and for other purposes,' approved September 14, 1922 (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 3). A vacancy occurring at any time in the office of district judge referred to in this act is authorized to be filled," and to amend the title so as to read: "A bill to remove the limitation upon the filling of vacancy of district judge for the district of New Jersey."

Mr. HEBERT. The House substitute is a change in verbiage only. The effect of it is the same as was the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator why it was necessary to authorize the President to fill a vacancy caused by the death of a judge?

Mr. HEBERT. When Judge Runyon was appointed in 1922 it was a temporary appointment. Since that time there have been no additional judges provided.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the Senator from Arkansas that this was a case where the original law provided that in case of death, removal, or resignation no successor should be appointed. It was thought when we enacted the law that the business would not keep up as it was then apparently doing. The judge appointed has died, and under the law the President has no authority to fill the office; in other words, the office expired with the death of the judge. The Judiciary Committee, after quite a full investigation, reached the conclusion that the position is necessary, and in effect reported a bill, which we passed, making that judgeship permanent instead of temporary. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I assume from the Senator's statement that the evidence before the committee showed such a change in conditions in the district, with respect to the amount of litigation, that it is apparent there is necessity for a permanent judge?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate concurs in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Max M. and Louis Levand, publishers of the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the motor industry, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate telegrams in the nature of memorials from W. J. Spencer, president of the Farmers' Union Mutual Insurance Co., of Salina; Homer J. Ferguson, secretary Kansas Association Mutual Insurance Cos., of McPherson, and the Farmers' Alliance Insurance Co., by I. F. Talbott, president, of McPherson, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes pertaining to mutual insurance companies in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Robert J. Cottrell, secretary of the Citizens' Joint Committee on Fiscal Relations between the United States and the District of Columbia, inclosing printed matter relative to the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia, particularly the so-called Federal lump-sum appropriation and cuts in the pending District of Columbia appropriation bill, which, with the accompanying data, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ASHURST presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Globe (Ariz.) R. F. D. No. 1, remonstrating against changing the Rural Free Delivery Service to a contract or wholesale delivery basis, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Howard S. Reed, secretary Arizona Society, Sons of American Revolution, Phoenix, Ariz., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 10138) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C., which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENDRICK presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of Laramie, Wyo., praying for the passage of the so-called Goldsborough bill, being the bill (H. R. 11499) for restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of County Commissioners of Albany County, Wyo., relative to proposed legislation authorizing the transfer of the unappropriated public lands to the several States, and favoring the amendment of such legislation by providing for a review of the recommendations of the commission established thereunder either by the Congress or the President upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, in charge of the national forests, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

RELIEF SITUATION IN KING COUNTY, WASH.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have a copy of a resolution adopted by the county commissioners of King County, Wash., which very vividly sets out the condition of affairs there. I ask that the resolution may be read at the desk and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

Resolution No. 4700

Whereas private charity and the local governments, city and county, are rapidly approaching the end of their available resources in providing food for unemployed, and more than 17,000 families in Seattle alone, aggregating more than 53,000 individuals, have been provided with food during the winter from city and county funds, augmented by private donations, and more than 2,500 homeless men are being given one meal daily; and

Whereas the city of Seattle now has funds available to continue this program for not more than two weeks and the board of county commissioners has reached the limit of funds which may be appropriated by direct vote of the board, and it is impossible under State laws to submit an additional bond issue to voters until the general election of November 8; and

Whereas the plight of the unemployed is not due to local causes but is attributable entirely to the nation-wide depression; and

Whereas our people are not asking charity but work, and the local governmental units are fast approaching and in some instances have already reached the limit of their abilities to provide work; and

Whereas the board of county commissioners believe that action on a national program of unemployment relief, primarily in the form of providing work, is urgently necessary and that it would be little short of disastrous for Congress to adjourn without making provision for such a program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Board of County Commissioners of King County, Wash., does urge the consideration and passage of one of the pending bills providing a $5,000,000,000 issue of prosperity bonds for the purpose of initiating a nation-wide public-works program, believing that such a program would not only provide employment for a large part of the unemployed but would encourage general industry and provide the impetus that would lead America out of the depression; and be it further

Resolved, That the board especially urges that either in the $5,000,000,000 bill or by amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, or both, provision be made for purchase by the National Government or some agency under it of bonds that may be issued by municipalities and other local governmental units for local public-works programs or relief of unemployment.

Passed this 10th day of May, 1932.

DON. H. EVANS,
W. B. BRINTON,
J. A. EARLEY,
Board of County Commissioners, King County, Wash.

Attest:

GEORGE A. GRANT,
Clerk of Board.
By C. F. GAGE, Deputy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, also I have received a telegram that has been sent to the President from the city of Seattle, Wash., from Henry Lochow, exalted ruler, No. 92, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, which is addressed to His Excellency President Hoover, Washington, D. C., and reads as follows:

SEATTLE, May 13, 1932.

His Excellency President HOOVER,
Washington, D. C.:

There are now 58,000 dependents in Seattle. County and city funds are running low. Persons fed here are from all over the country. Not fair to unload entire burden on us. The situation affects every fraternal organization and the people as well. Something should be done before Congress adjourns.

HENRY LOCHOW,
Exalted Ruler, No. 92, B. P. O. Elks.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have received a petition signed by Mrs. C. M. Smith, of Providence, and 1,600 other citizens of Rhode Island, which reads as follows:

The undersigned Rhode Island citizens urge you to work vigorously and promptly for restoration of confidence through the immediate balancing of the Federal Budget, this to be accomplished by—

First. Substantial lowering of Government expenses, including a reduction of Government salaries and wages in proportion to similar cuts suffered by the great mass of citizens not in Government employ.

Second. Passage of an equitable tax bill.

Third. Refusal of expensive favors to selfish organized minorities.

I ask that the petition be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

REGULAR OFFICERS DETAILED TO TRAIN NATIONAL GUARD

Mr. SMITH presented a telegram from the Governor of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA, S. C., May 17, 1932.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Federal inspections of South Carolina National Guard reveal that it has reached a higher state of efficiency than ever in its history. This pleasing condition has resulted from the spirit of the guardsmen themselves, but primarily from the tactful guidance of Regular personnel detailed to assist in operating our national defense act. To eliminate Regular officers available for this duty will deny the guardsmen the training essential to meet their great responsibility as first-line troops in the next emergency, and it will potentially result in deaths of citizens and in more homes throughout this country thrown into bereavement and mourning through lack of essential peace training.

IBRA C. BLACKWOOD, Governor.

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN GOVERNMENTAL EXPENSES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the following telegrams and letters from chambers of commerce and similar organizations in Kansas, urging reductions in governmental expenditures.

I might add, Mr. President, that these are only typical of many other resolutions, letters, messages, and demands received from the people of Kansas. Kansas people feel that the first place to start in balancing the Budget should be through drastic reductions in Federal expenditures.

I wish to say further that the people are right in those demands. The taxpayers expect, and have a right to expect, that Congress make an earnest and successful effort to reduce governmental expenditures. Every business man, every taxpayer, practically, in the entire country has been obliged to cut down outgo to meet income. When he sees the Federal Government trying to strike a balance by increasing its income—by picking the pockets of the taxpayers—to meet outgo he feels outraged and indignant.

I have supported and voted for every move this session of Congress to reduce expenditures by the Federal Government. I repeat, we should have started by cutting the salaries of Senators and Congressmen. It is not a question of what we would like to do; it is a plain duty of this Congress to cut expenditures, to reduce appropriations, to balance the Budget by economies in government before increasing tax levies and adding to the sources of taxation.

I have here messages from the Chambers of Commerce of Abilene, Topeka, Girard, Iola, Coffeyville, and Lyndon that tell the story. The people of this country are demanding that Congress actually cut expenditures and reduce taxes instead of increasing them. I send these messages to the desk with the request they be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegrams and letters were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABILENE, KANS., May 10, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

The Abilene Chamber of Commerce, representing the sentiment of this community, urges you to use your influence and bend every effort toward getting the National Budget balanced and Federal expenditures, including salaries, reduced.

THE ABILENE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
T. H. EASTER, President.
M. B. MCCLESKEY, Secretary.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Topeka, Kans., May 9, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You are viewing the situation from a close point and we are viewing it from a long distance. We are confident that you would appreciate knowing the views of a good many representative people in Topeka.

Some 200 people were assembled to-day, and I was directed by that group to convey a message to you that we believe you are interested in hearing.

Briefly, the thought is this: The Budget must be balanced, and there are only two ways it can be accomplished—either collect more money or spend less money.

Not only the group assembled but the people generally that we come in contact with indicate that they are following closely the action of Congress with regard to present and future expenditures. People generally are disturbed and nervous for fear that you gentlemen will not do what might be expected of you. Those of us who know you personally are relying on your good judgment and your ability to sense the rumblings of the taxpayers and voters of this community. People are cognizant of the growing unrest that is prevalent to-day.

The dilemma in which we find ourselves to-day can not be attributed to something that happened last week or last month. It has been steadily growing and is rapidly growing to a head.

We shall appreciate very much your sincere and hearty cooperation in accomplishing what we believe to be important legislation regarding the contemplated revision of expenditures by the Federal Government.

Very truly yours,

M. DREHMER, Secretary.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Topeka, Kans., May 9, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I was very happy to read in Saturday's and yesterday's papers of the organized effort in Washington to reduce expenses in order that the Budget might be balanced.

It is certainly the feeling of every business man and property owner in the city of Topeka that the time has come when its expenses throughout the Government must be reduced to balance the Budget, and that taxes must not be increased. It is also the feeling of representative people in Topeka that official Washington must act if this Government is to stand.

Everyone on Kansas Avenue is strong for cutting the overhead to meet the Budget and have it done quickly.

With my kind personal regards, I am sincerely,

M. W. JENCKS.

GIRARD, KANS., May 12, 1932.

United States Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.:

The people of Girard and community request definite congressional action in balancing National Budget without regard to selfish interest of any group or organization. Believe that governmental expenditures can and should be reduced. Request that entire Kansas delegation take immediate steps toward bringing these things about.

GIRARD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
M. G. SLAWSON, President.

IOLA, KANS., May 11, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington:

Speaking for business and professional interests of Iola and trade territory, this organization decidedly opposes increase in first-class postage, bank-check tax, and other nuisance taxes until such time as a sincere effort to balance Budget by reduction in Federal salaries, closing of duplicating and unnecessary bureaus and commissions, and other national economies has failed to secure desired result. City, county, and State expenditures have been materially reduced in Kansas, and we suggest same course for our Government. Your hearty cooperation in such an effort is urged and expected. Above is result of special meeting held to-day and resolution in accord adopted.

IOLA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
C. A. DORSEY, Secretary.

IOLA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Iola, Kans., May 11, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In accord with a resolution adopted at a special meeting of this chamber to-day, a night letter is going forward which is self-explanatory and which will be in your hands before this confirmation arrives.

With a radical reduction in all lines of merchandising there has been a corresponding shading of incomes and salaries, and it strikes us as entirely consistent that Federal expenditures should follow the same logical procedure, instead of insisting upon burdensome and entirely avoidable nuisance taxes in order that Federal expenditures be kept at practically war-time figures and an already overtaxed people be further loaded to carry this unnecessary cost.

The ultimate consumer always—and properly—pays these added taxes, and you are quite aware that farmer, merchant, and manufacturer have steadily diminishing incomes which will not be helped in the least by present tax program. We are heartily in favor of a speedy balancing of our National Budget, but believe that sufficient economies can be made in present overhead to make many of the proposed taxes entirely unnecessary.

We solicit your best effort in making this sort of a program effective, for it is in line with what we as individuals have found practical and necessary.

Yours truly,

C. A. DORSEY, Secretary.

COFFEYVILLE, KANS., May 11, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am asked to send you the sentiment of the Coffeyville business men with reference to important present-day conditions.

On May 7 the following telegram was sent to President Herbert Hoover. Similar telegrams were sent by the two banks, the bankers' association, the mayor, the Business and Professional Women's Club, and the Coffeyville Merchants' Association: "The business of this country is in a most critical condition, and the illogical and wavering action of Congress is producing economic ruin. We heartily approve your course in calling for prompt action. We urge and demand a sound and economical balancing of the Budget." The telegram speaks for itself.

Every group of business men that gets together officially or unofficially is voicing a demand that immediate steps be taken for greater economy in the United States Government. The outcry for a balanced and economical Budget is growing stronger, and business men are insisting that the Congress of the United States should take prompt and drastic action.

Very truly yours,

COFFEYVILLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
JAMES A. GIBSON, Manager.

FROM THE LYNDON CLUB

We demand of the Congress as our representatives to act as business men and not as politicians to immediately take a position of leadership toward balancing the Budget.

We feel that this is a critical time in the affairs of our Government and that prosperity will only return when the cost of government is in harmony with other business conditions.

We demand that you work, act, and vote for measures which will balance the Budget by the reductions and eliminations of Government expenditures instead of the creation of new means of raising revenues through additional tax, either direct or indirect.

W. B. BANNING,
OLIVER GREEN,
GUIL CALKINS.
(And others).

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present two petitions from South Dakota, one of them from Hyde County and the other from Charles Mix County, signed by something like 200 persons, who are in favor of bimetallism.

I wish to state at this time that I have received various petitions signed by farmers throughout the Middle West and the West to the extent of 100,000 favoring my bill, Senate bill 2487.

I ask that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, and that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance and the body of one of them was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution and petition to Congress urging passage of Wheeler bill, S. 2487

Whereas a medium of exchange so limited in quantity as to make its use prohibitive in world commerce, either in direct coinage service or as a basis for currency issue (even when not cornered, but given the freest possible circulation); and

Whereas silver as a precious metal is admirably adapted, both as a direct and indirect medium of exchange, for world commerce, same being already in use in most of the nations of the world; and

Whereas the remonetization of silver will not only be an essential step toward dethroning a despotic, usurping tyrant—that is, heading man "back to the cave"—but also toward such issuance and control of money as provided for in the Constitution; and

Whereas the conquests of science and invention have brought the world to our door, making ox-cart isolation very impractical, expensive, and inconvenient, if not tragical; and

Whereas the last stand of the "gold standard" battling to retain world supremacy has so paralyzed world commerce as to place recovery in question or doubt:

Therefore, as loyal American citizens looking toward the welfare and perpetuity of our Nation, we herewith petition you, our representatives in Congress, to lend all possible support to the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, as an initial step toward "honest money" and credit, and toward that end we herewith subscribe our names.

Respectfully submitted for your cooperation.

WELFARE-WORK EXPENDITURES IN MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with the statement just read at the desk, presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I wish to have printed in the RECORD—I will not ask that it be read at the desk—a news article published in the Boston Herald of May 14 of this year setting forth the great burden upon the municipalities in the State of Massachusetts due to extra demands for appropriations for welfare work. The headlines of these news articles are as follows:

Massachusetts is staggering under $50,000,000 "dole" for year. Per capita expenditure of $15 a person. Boston expects to spend $14,000,000, or six times the total for 1928.

I ask that this article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Herald, May 14, 1932]

MASSACHUSETTS IS STAGGERING UNDER FIFTY-MILLION "DOLE" FOR YEAR—PER CAPITA EXPENDITURE OF $15 A PERSON—BOSTON EXPECTS TO SPEND $14,000,000, OR SIX TIMES THE TOTAL FOR 1928

By Edward Allen

Massachusetts this year is staggering under the burden of a $50,000,000 "dole."

This sum does not include the cost of running expensive State, municipal, county, and Federal hospitals and institutions. It does not represent money paid out by the State for public welfare or cash expended by the Federal Government for veterans' compensation and pensions.

It includes merely the cost of operating welfare agencies in the cities and towns for the immediate relief of the unemployed or extraordinary suffering caused by the death or incapacity of the family provider.

It amounts to a per capita expenditure of about $15 a person. Each taxpayer has to bear many times that amount.

In Boston the "dole," public and private, is expected to exceed $14,000,000 this year.

The overseers of the public welfare alone are distributing more than $1,000,000 every month.

The $3,000,000 raised in the united Boston unemployment campaign was barely sufficient to maintain the institutions for which it was collected for 10 weeks.

Soldiers' relief, due to the discharge of veterans employed on the Kenmore Square subway-extension project, is mounting rapidly. In April, 1931, the department spent $26,142. Last month it distributed $105,014.

Since then 103 veterans have been laid off, with the expectancy that the figure would reach 500 within a few days. The rest have been placed on part time.

At the present rate soldiers' relief will cost the city more than $1,125,000 this year. The cost for the first four months of 1932 was $275,956, as compared with $170,000 in 1931.

In addition private charities received from the privately collected unemployment fund a third of the $3,000,000 which was successfully raised. Their share does not include the income from large gifts, endowments, and other regular sources.

In March, 1932, the Family Welfare Society of Boston distributed $49,148.12, as compared with $20,333.06 a year ago. The expenditures of other private charitable organizations increased proportionately.

The Worcester "dole" is now in excess of that paid by Boston in 1928 in spite of the fact that Boston is more than four times as large as the central Massachusetts city.

The Worcester public welfare department spent $444,182 in 1928. Last year it expended $1,239,033.39. So far this year it has distributed $680,026. In addition, the city raised $628,404 for its private charities in the annual community-fund campaign.

Boston's overseers of the public welfare spent only $2,200,000 in 1928—a sixth of what they will expend this year if present conditions continue.

Newton, with its admirable system of coordinating private and public charity, is able to account for every penny expended on the unemployed.

In the first four months this year Newton distributed for various forms of charity $96,010.15, or more than the entire 1928 expenditure of $85,703.35. The 1931 figure was $204,358.

Because of the multiplicity of systems employed in the various municipalities and because of the overlapping between payment for labor and the "dole" for involuntary idleness, comparison of the cost of relief in the various cities and towns is virtually impossible.

The Newton figures include soldiers' relief, mothers' aid, old-age pensions, the mayor's welfare committee, which spent $36,000 of private funds for labor last year, and the welfare bureau, another organization dispensing private funds.

The Cambridge public-welfare role will cost more than $1,000,000 this year. In nine months last year the figure was $477,000. In 12 months of 1928 it was only $194,000.

The Brookline welfare list for the first four months of 1932 cost $75,629, more than twice the entire 1928 figure of $37,211. The 1931 expenditures were only $110,801.

BIG BELMONT GAIN

In Belmont welfare relief cost $8,733 in 1928, $17,505.86 during the first four months this year.

Concord welfare department has shown a decrease. The expense for the first four months this year was $3,700. Last year it was $4,600. The total last year was $1,000 less than 1928, when the figure stood at $13,000.

Haverhill's expenditures for the same department during the first four months this year were $129,461—in excess of the entire 1928 figure. The 1931 total was $294,183.67.

Lexington in three months this year outstripped its entire 1928 expenditure of $7,226. Its 1931 total was $16,413.

In Lawrence, exclusive of mothers' aid, the welfare cost in April was $46,585. The expense for the first four months was $174,916 as compared with $281,268 for 12 months last year.

In Watertown the expenditure was $53,699 in 1928, $204,564 in 1931, $111,596 so far this year.

In Waltham the city paid $124,093.22 in 1928, $314,714 last year, $86,689 so far this year.

Needham spent $15,915 in 1928, $40,686 last year, $4,716 in April.

Milton spent $1,500 from public funds and $3,200 from the Cunningham fund in April. In 1928 its entire relief costs were only $12,297.

The smaller cities and towns are keeping pace with Boston in the increase of expenditures for soldiers' relief. Wakefield spent $6,000 for this item in 1928, $19,210 in 1931, $12,356 so far this year.

Reading spent $6,599 in 1928, $10,962 last year, $3,157 in three months this year.

Fall River spent for welfare relief, mothers' aid, and soldiers' relief in 1928, $449,328; in 1931, $750,425; so far this year, $292,021.

Chelsea spent more than $410,000 for general and soldiers' aid in 1931 and has spent nearly $190,000 already in 1932.

Revere spent for welfare relief in 1931, $155,177, and, exclusive of administration expenses, has spent $73,110 this year.

Winthrop spent $28,180.40 for welfare and soldiers' relief in 1931. The figures so far this year are not available.

Natick's welfare and soldiers' aid expenses in 1928 were nearly $35,000. In 1931 they had mounted to $119,000. In addition, $9,931 has been spent in recent months from a privately collected fund.

WELLESLEY SPENDS $750 A WEEK

Wellesley's relief list in 1928 cost $12,000. Last year showed a slight increase—to $15,743. However, an additional $35,000 was spent for "made" work for the jobless in 1931 and the present expenditure is $750 a week.

Somerville spent for welfare and soldiers' relief in 1928, $220,526; last year, $509,578.54; estimated for 1932, $839,600.

Melrose spent more than $57,000 for soldiers' relief and public welfare in 1931. So far this year it has spent more than $27,000.

Medford spent $158,490 in 1931 for the same items; this year it has spent nearly $86,000 in four months.

Everett spent $490,000 in 1931 for soldiers' and public welfare; this year it spent $250,000 in four months and estimates the cost of relief alone for the year at $625,000.

LIBERTY, DEATH, AND THE SOLDIER—ADDRESS BY JOHN M. COFFEE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by John M. Coffee before the joint meeting of all Spanish War Veterans' camps at Tacoma, April 19, 1932, entitled "Liberty, Death, and the Soldier."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To-night, fellow citizens, we are met to commemorate muster day, a date dear to the hearts of all Spanish War veterans. While it should properly fall on April 21, I am informed that this is the meeting night of your organizations occurring nearest to that date.

It is peculiarly fitting that we should discuss patriotic events and give utterance to patriotic sentiments, on the night of April 19, for it was on this date in 1775 that our forefathers had their first sanguinary combat for liberty with those who would deprive them of that precious possession. Who does not remember the poet's lines:

"'Twas the 18th of April in '75,
And hardly a man is now alive
Who remembers that famous day and year
Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere. * * *"

That romantic nocturnal ride through the Massachusetts countryside is carved indelibly in the hearts of all liberty-loving Americans, for it presaged the successful initial battle at Lexington on the next day. To students of American history, this day, the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, has a definite sentimental attachment. If any of you have visited that sylvan scene, as have I, and have watched the placid river as it flows under that old wooden bridge, unruffled in its calm on its way to meet the sea, you must thrill with me in golden memory of a spot never to be forgotten. 'Twas Ralph Waldo Emerson who said, in dedication of the Concord monument, those immortal noble lines:

"By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard 'round the world.

* * * * *

"On this green bank, by this soft stream,
We set to-day a votive stone
That memory may their deed redeem
When, like our sires, our sons are gone.

"Spirit that made those heroes dare
To die, or leave their children free,
Bid time and nature gently spare
The shaft we raise to them and thee."

My friends, enshrined forever in the hearts of their succeeding countrymen will be the glory of that April day. What a significance has April in the struggle of liberty up from its primitive beginnings to its fruition in modern times, especially in American history! April saw the commencement of the Revolution; April saw the inauguration of George Washington as our first President in 1789; April witnessed James Knox Polk's fiery declaration of war with Mexico; in April came the firing on Fort Sumter and its gallant defense for three long days and nights by Major Anderson, and with it the start-off of a 4-year fratricidal war that nearly tore this Nation asunder; April saw America again marching to the rescue of the oppressed and downtrodden subject peoples under the thralldom of Spain. Again in April America went to war against Germany and her allies inspired by Woodrow Wilson's ideal of self-determination of nations, freedom of the seas, and liberty for subjugated nationalities. In April was born and died, in 1564 and 1616, respectively, the greatest man of letters who ever lived at any time and any place in the history of the world. He infused the breath of life into literature and climaxed the Renaissance at the end of the Dark Ages. The inspiration of his writings shall never perish. His name was William Shakespeare. To him the cause of liberty owes an unrequitable debt of gratitude.

Throughout all history the progress of civilization has been marked by the bloody struggles of people for liberty. My friends, stray back with me along the shadowy labyrinthine corridors of time. Envision with me the lessons which history teaches us.

We speak of liberty as one thing and of virtue, wealth, knowledge, invention, national strength, and national independence as other things. But of all these liberty is the source, the mother, the necessary condition. She is to virtue what light is to color, to wealth what sunshine is to grain, to knowledge what eyes are to sight. She is a genius of invention, the brawn of national strength, the spirit of national independence. Where liberty rises there virtue grows, wealth increases, knowledge expands, invention multiplies human powers, and in strength and spirit the freer nation rises among her neighbors as Saul amid his brethren—taller and fairer. Where liberty sinks there virtue fades, wealth diminishes, knowledge is forgotten, invention ceases, and empires once mighty in arms and arts become a helpless prey to barbarians.

Only in broken gleams and partial light has the sun of liberty beamed among men, but all progress has she evoked. Like the poet, let us ever charge ourselves to "follow the gleam."

Liberty came to a race of slaves crouching under Egyptian whips and brought them forth from the house of bondage. She calloused them in the desert and metamorphosed them into a race of conquerors. The spirit of the Mosaic law lifted their thinkers up to the sunlit heights where they beheld the unity of God, and inspired their poets with strains that yet phrase the noblest sublimities of thought. Liberty dawned on the Phœnician coast and ships passed the Pillars of Hercules to plow the uncharted sea. After the darkness of slavery the arrival of liberty came like the effusion of Shakespeare, "Night's candles are burned out, and jocund dawn stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops." Liberty shed a partial light on Greece, and marble grew to shapes of ideal beauty, words became the flaming instruments of subtlest thoughts, and against the scanty soldiery of free cities the innumerable caravan of the great King of Persia broke like surges of ocean breakers against a rock-bound coast. She cast her ray on the small farms of Italian husbandmen, and born of her strength a power came forth that conquered the world. They glinted from shields of German warriors, and Augustus wept for his legions.

Out of the night that followed her eclipse, Liberty's slanting rays fell again on free cities, and modern civilization began. A new world was unveiled, and lost learning found again. Alike as liberty grew, so grew wealth, art, knowledge, power, and refinement. Every nation's history has enscrolled on its pages the same truth. The strength born of the Magna Charta won Crecy and Agincourt. It was the rebirth of freedom from the despotism of the Tudors that glorified the Elizabethan Age. It was the renaissance of liberty from the tyranny of the Stuarts which brought on the golden era of Victorian culture. It was the spirit that brought a crowned tyrant to the block—Charles II—that planted here the seed of a mighty tree. Ancient freedom, the moment that its energy had gained unity for its devotees, made Spain the mightiest power of the world, only to fall to the lowest depth of darkness when tyranny succeeded liberty. All French intellectual vigor died under the absolutism of the seventeenth century, only to revive in splendor as Liberty awoke in the eighteenth and on the enfranchisement of the peasantry in the great Revolution, culminating in the power that in our times has defied defeat.

Shall we not trust her? To-day, as in times before, creep on the insidious forces that destroy liberty by producing inequality. Liberty calls to us again. Her clarion voice points a warning finger at the horizon, where the clouds are beginning to lower. She calls to us again to follow her further; to trust her fully. We must unstintedly accept her or she will not linger in our midst. It is not enough that man should vote nor that he be theoretically equal with his fellow before the law. Liberty must lead us on to avail ourselves of the opportunities of life. Men must stand on equal terms in relation to the bounty of nature. Otherwise Liberty withdraws her light. Either this or darkness approaches and progress vanishes in the murk of the night. This is the law of the universe. This is the lesson of the centuries. Unless founded upon justice and liberty the social structure can not stand.

We know that Babylon, Persia, Syria, and Egypt all fell and their enlightenment was destroyed when the modicum of liberty their rulers allowed them was taken away. Phœnicia became a great shipping nation because it threw off the chains which encompassed its liberty of contract. The glory that was Greece attained full flower under the Republic, and the most magnificent utterances of its orators, dramatists, and poets were made in praise of liberty. So up from the darkness and gloom of slavery struggled the ancient people. Rome flourished under the Republic when liberty inspired the people; but with the coming of the Empire, at the time of the birth of Christ, the sappers and the miners dug caves under Freedom's superstructure, and the beauty and learning of Rome under the lashings of enslavement and the decadence and moral disintegration of the emperors faded away. From 476, when Rome fell, until 732, the Battle of Tours, liberty was under a cloud and all but disappeared from the earth's surface. But at Tours the dark forces of the Moslem were turned back from northern Europe and the future civilization saved. Spain was obscure and unknown until it drove the Moors out of the country in 1491. After Tours, and thenceforward until 1215, our European forbears, in direst ignorance and woeful servitude, continued their bloody struggle. One thousand two hundred and fifteen is one of the outstanding dates of history, for in that year the medievalism gave way to a form of representative government. King John, on the field of Runnymede, signed the Magna Charta, the first great palladium of liberty vouchsafed the common people in the Christian era, and thereafter came the Renaissance. England has had many a struggle for liberty—the Wars of Roses, the driving out of the Stuarts in 1649 and 1688, the struggles in Parliament culminating in England's Bill of Rights. Italy united and drove out the enemy in 1870. France stormed the Bastile in 1789, and after years of the bloody Directory and Robespierre, became a republic. Napoleon, intoxicated by his military successes, temporarily held back liberty from the French, but in 1871, after the Franco-Prussian War, a third republic was formed, and under the broad freedom enjoyed thereunder France has become one of the three great powers of the world.

No lover of liberty may neglect to pay a tribute to Rousseau, Voltaire (who thundered at the emperors, "I may not agree with a single word you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it"), and Montesquieu. Frederick the Great encouraged freedom in Prussia and after the Revolution of 1848 we see a new Germany emerging, but it remained for the defeat of Germany in the World War to launch a new and greater nation. No military dictator such as the Kaiser and no despot resembling the Iron Chancellor, Bismarck, ever exalted a nation into the do-or-die spirit. Spain in 1931 threw out the Bourbons and begat a republic. Watch Spain from now on. The Turks tried to overrun Europe with their religion of despair and their bloody absolute forms of government but were stopped at the gates of Vienna three centuries ago by little Poland, which up to the World War was dismembered and almost forgotten. Out of the chaos of that conflict, when the tumult and the shouting died, sprang forth a rejuvenated Poland, a free and independent nation with a corridor to the sea. The scattered legions of Napoleon after Jena overwhelmed Europe and almost turned back five centuries of political progress, but this arrogant despot couldn't surmount the forces of nature, and the retreat from Moscow in 1812 was the beginning of the end. The opponents of Napoleon were filled with an unquenchable thirst for liberty, and they united under Blücher and Wellington, and the Battle of Leipzig was followed by Napoleon's more disastrous defeat at Waterloo and his banishment to St. Helena. The world breathed more easily, but at Vienna in 1815, led by the arch tyrant Metternich, the few remaining emperors tried to parcel up the booty among themselves. There and then they set the long fuse to the powder magazine that became the World War a century later. Once given a taste of liberty, the common people will not surrender the prize. Beating with deathless pulsations in human breasts is the yearning for a free home, a free speech, a free press, and freedom of religion.

Thomas Jefferson, America's greatest protagonist of liberty, was born in this month of April. He it was who wrote those immortal words from the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Notice, my friends, how Jefferson stresses the word "liberty." The French have as their motto on their national coat-of-arms, "Liberte, egalite, fraternite." Patrick Henry cried out amid the agony of those early days: "I care not what others may say, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death." The Revolution was fought to bring to us freedom from an oppressive mother country and liberty to rule ourselves for ourselves.

The War of 1812 was fought to prevent England depriving American seamen of their right of citizenship and to destroy England's interference with our freedom of trade. We helped Texas remove itself from the iron heel of oppression in 1836, and we fought with Mexico to bring political freedom to the inhabitants of the southwestern part of the United States. We waged the Civil War to determine once and for all the right of our "fellow countryman in chains," the negro, to be captain of his fate and master of his own soul. "No more shall the war cry sever or the winding river run red" after that bloody holocaust. In April, General Lee surrendered at Appomattox and Johnson surrendered in the same month to Sherman in North Carolina. The tortured Nation was again rewelded.

In 1868 began the noble battle of the Cuban peasants for independence from the Spanish overlords. Sporadically they were helped by American sympathizers, but in 1895 Spain determined upon the inauguration of a butchering and starvation policy, and the world was horrified. The Spanish governor, Weyler, corralled the Cuban farmer in prison camps and impoverished and starved the country. These camps were called "reconcentrados," and no food or sustenance could be obtained outside their walls. But Cuban patriots fought on for independence, for the precious freedom denied to them. The Queen Regent, finding the reign of terror of Weyler unavailing, essayed a policy of conciliation and named Blanco to succeed Weyler, but it was too late. The die had been cast, and "the Rubicon was crossed."

Intrepid Cuban General Garcia rerallied his scattered and tattered troops crying, "On, on to victory." Had he not had the examples of the great negro patriot, Toussaint L'Ouverture, who in a magnificent campaign drove the French out of Haiti a few decades before? Were not the Cuban patriots fired with zeal to emulate Miranda, who drove the Spanish tyrant out of Central America, and Bolivar, the George Washington of the Southern Cross, who drove the Spaniards into the sea and gave South America back to the common people?

Naturally, the United States was sympathetic. We had fought the same fight in the Revolution. We sent the battleship Maine to Habana Harbor to show our regard, but alas, some sinister force in the dead of night planted a terrible explosive, and the beautiful ship was sent to the bottom in a cataclysm that electrified the world. Two hundred and sixty-six brave boys were sent to their eternal abode by that dastardly blow. America was horrified. With difficulty McKinley held in leash the dogs of war, but no people could stomach for long such a brazen affront to their dignity and honor. War was declared April 21, and the militiamen and regulars leaped to arms. Thereafter was fought the only American war in 100 years in which only volunteers exclusively participated. The boys moved on Tampa, Chickamauga, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. Who can not remember the names of some of the brave commanders, Miles, Shafter, Merritt, Lawton, Wheeler, Wood, Roosevelt, and Funston, and on the sea, Schley, Sampson, and Robley D. Evans?

Retreat is a word not found within the lexicon of the American soldier or sailor. There was no retreat at Lexington, Ticonderoga, Saratoga, Trenton, Monmouth, or Yorktown in the Revolutionary War. There was no retreat when the Constitution shattered the Guerriere, or at Forts Henry and Donelson, or at Lundys Lane, Chippewa, or New Orleans in the War of 1812. There was no retreat at Monterey, at Chepultepec, at Cerro Gordo, at Buena Vista in the war with Mexico. There was no retreat at Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Shiloh, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Petersburg, and Vicksburg in the Civil War. Retreat was out of the question at El Caney, San Juan Hill, Manila Bay, Santiago, and the fights with Aguinaldo in the Spanish War. Retreat was the missing link from the chain forged by our troops in the World War at Soissons, at Belleau Wood, the Argonne, and Chateau Thierry.

The Spanish War was fought by brave men, all volunteers. They were imbued by a love of liberty and a desire to sever the chains binding their Cuban and Philippine brothers to the yoke of the Spanish tyrant. They came, not to enslave but to free—not to destroy but to save. Theirs was an inspired mission. They plowed through fever-infested swamps. They ran the gantlet of the malaria mosquito, they hazarded their lives in the torrid jungles of the Tropics, beset by snakes, filth, insects, impure water, decayed food, and embalmed beef. Theirs was no golden road of romance or a marching to battle between lines of waving, cheering multitudes; theirs was no glitter and pomp; they were not endowed with the privileges of free postage, Y. M. C. A. camps, Salvation Army lassies, publicly maintained recreation camps. No hostess houses arranged for beauteous ladies to beguile their idle hours; no Sam Browne belts added to the pulchritude of their appearance; no French maidens administered to their playful whims; theirs was a grim business—to drive the Spanish devil out of the thicket. Nights they slept in the open—"no roof but the vault of heaven, no floor but the beaten sod." The bravery of the 1st of May at Manila Bay is unparalleled in our naval annals. The matchless fortitude of Naval Constructor R. P. Hobson, Ensign Blue, who carried the message to García, and of the sailors that sunny Sunday morning of July 3, 1898, when our fleet drove the last vestige of Spain's navy from the surface of the ocean in a battle marked by heroism on both sides, baffles comparison. Thus was Spain eclipsed and Cuba, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Philippines divorced from their unloving spouse. Alike in all these battles has the American soldier and sailor fought for liberty under that beautiful flag [pointing]:

"The flag whose red is her heroes' blood
That laved its infancy;
Whose white is her undying fame
Of stainless purity;
Whose blue her field of azure is Where, gleaming from afar,
We see a star for every State,
A State for every star * * *."

The soldiers of the American Revolution received no pension for many years, and then only in the most niggardly amounts. It was nearly 20 years after Lincoln's assassination before the Civil War veterans received reluctant pension recognition from Congress. The Spanish War veterans received no pensions until years after the World War, and then with the help of World War veterans.

Liberty for the oppressed peoples has been fought for by our soldiers in every war. Our intervention in Cuba was an idealistic act. To them we kept the faith. We found Cuba a skeleton of unrelated, unshaped visions and dreams; we clothed it in flesh and blood, and there emerged the island republic of to-day, a gem of the Carribean. The independence of the Philippines must come if we are to keep our faith with those who paid "their last full measure of devotion."

And speaking of the soldiers who are gone, those whom we honor on Memorial Day, let me say that no sweeter honey of its kind has dripped from the hive of genius than the immortal words of the poet:

"On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread. * * *"

In a few short years the last survivor of ninety-eight will have bivouacked on the fields of the beyond. Let us dedicate these words on their monument: "He who saves his country saves all things, and all things saved bless him." For he died to make men happy and he died to make men free. Nor shall we permit hostile forces to-day, from within or without, to prevent our carrying into effect the words of Lincoln, when he said: "* * * From these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave their last full measure of devotion." The challenge is here: "Let us here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain." The reign of the gangster must be destroyed. People's homes and children must be made safe. Let us not mock our heritage. We must exercise our vote and not merely give a votary gesture before party fetishes.

Let us refuse to send into office puppet mediocrities who dance on strings pulled by the manipulating machines controlled by the racketeer. Let us not drown out America's acclaim in this bicentennial year of the fame of Washington 200 years after his birth with the rattle of the gangster's machine gun and the agonized screams of men shot in the back in the land of the free and the home of the brave. Let us not permit the loyalty of our citizenry to our institutions to be eradicated by the gnawing aches of hunger in a land of plenty. Let us give our people economic freedom as well as political freedom.

Soldiers of high and low degree have no social distinctions in death; no gaudy tinsels or gilded trappings can create invidious distinctions at the sepulcher's dread mouth. How well did the great poet Gray phrase it when he wrote:

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave Await alike the inevitable hour;
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

It is a mournful, somber truth that all men when crossing the bar must shed the onus of their griefs and honors; that man takes with him only that which he has freely given away, but we do know this—that even death may not despoil the soldier of the riches of his patriotic service and self-sacrifice. The soldier takes with him to his bier a legacy so rare that even envy is compelled to pay the tribute of admiration. Many of these men "matched mountains" in their bravery and "compelled the stars to turn aside to conquer" them.

The time has come again, my friends who fought the good fight 34 years ago, when the drums should beat and the lights gleam from the church tower to rouse us to our danger. Let us gird on our armor anew and go out to give guage of battle. Emerson said of our country: "It is God's best effort in behalf of the human race." I say to you in God's name, let us allow no force to annihilate that which our fathers builded. We have too many laws which maketh no respect for law and too many laws mean loss of freedom. You may ask me why I am so excited, but I reply to you, as did William Lloyd Garrison, the great abolitionist, the man whom malignity searched with candles to destroy:

"Brother, I have need to be all on fire
For I have mountains of ice about me to melt."

In closing I pay this tribute to the deceased Spanish War veteran:

"Erect with shining head
The great Republic claims her dead;
Nor in that day when every stripe and star
Proclaims the reign of peace
Shall honor to them cease,
Nor fame their laurel mar;
Though no battle peal awake them,
Time upon its scroll shall make them
Among earth's heroes dead,
Whose deeds that golden day more swiftly sped."

SURVEY OF INDIAN CONDITIONS—EXPENSES

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 193 on the calendar, providing for an appropriation for the subcommittee on Indian Affairs. It was promised a few days ago that there would be a calendar day within a day or two. That was last week, and it has not come. The committee is in need of the money proposed to be appropriated by the resolution. I do not think its consideration and passage will require any discussion at all.

Mr. SMOOT. If the resolution should lead to any discussion, I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 193) submitted by Mr. FRAZIER on April 5, 1932, which had been reported with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "$12,000" and to insert "$6,000," so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, authorized by Senate Resolution No. 79, Seventieth Congress, agreed to February 1, 1928, to make a general survey of Indian conditions, hereby is authorized to expend in furtherance of the purposes of said resolution $6,000 in excess of the amount heretofore authorized.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota to what kind of a survey the resolution has reference?

Mr. FRAZIER. A general survey of the condition of the Indians. The money proposed to be appropriated by the resolution is largely to continue the work already done and to get out the reports of the investigations which the committee has already made.

Mr. BORAH. It is to complete what the committee has already undertaken?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

"FINISH AND ADJOURN"—EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of this morning entitled "Finish and Adjourn."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FINISH AND ADJOURN

Reports from Capitol Hill that a summer session is contemplated are a severe blow to the whole country. Business and industry are counting on an adjournment about June 10. Legislative uncertainty has been a handicap to recovery for several months. It was hoped that that handicap would be removed before the holding of the national conventions, and business interests have been gathering strength for a fresh assault upon the depression as soon as Congress gives them a chance. If prospects of settled conditions during the summer fade out of the picture, a fresh pall of gloom will settle over the entire country.

Congress has more than three weeks in which to dispose of its unfinished business. Speaker GARNER gives assurance that the House will be ready to adjourn by June 4, which means that the adjournment is dependent entirely upon the Senate. That body is making good progress with the tax bill. It has shown a disposition to cling to the recommendations of its Finance Committee. A strong nonpartisan group of Republicans and Democrats are supporting the committee bill. Indications are that they will be able to put the bill through the Senate in substantially its present form. If so, the Senate could finish up its work on the tax bill this week.

Appropriation bills have been given careful consideration by committees of both Houses. They should not require extensive debate on the floor of the Senate. The economy bill is being whipped into shape, and since the issues that it will involve are already well understood it should not be a major source of delay. Nonpartisan efforts are being made to shape a relief measure. It would not be impossible to rush this project through before June 10 if politics could be left in the background. Congress can move with remarkable speed when it is so inclined. Even failure of the relief project would be less disturbing than a summer session of Congress.

At present the two major parties are cooperating with a view to balancing the Budget. The Senate is disposing of its business with a minimum of political influence. That attitude may be expected to prevail until the adjournment for the political conventions. If the business of Congress has been wound up by that time, the political volcanoes can erupt without disturbing the movement toward economic recovery. But if the Budget remains unbalanced and the fate of other legislation remains in doubt, another raid on confidence and further deflation may be expected.

After the conventions nonpartisan action would be impossible. Every measure before Congress would be thrown into the seething caldron of politics. Congressmen would use the floors of the House and Senate for political speeches and legislation would soon reach a stalemate. The country has already witnessed two stampedes in the House. What could be expected when the political campaigns were in full swing? Passage of the bonus inflation bill by that body would be almost a certainty. Radical measures of all varieties would be pressed forward to cure the depression.

Every sober-minded Congressman must dread the prospects of such an orgy, yet not one of them will have power enough to prevent it if Congress returns to Washington for a postconvention session. Every possible effort should be directed toward the completion of all essential measures before June 10. Members of Congress are working long hours and under a terrific strain, but the energy required to bring about an adjournment within the next three weeks is inconsequential in comparison with the energy that would be wasted in futile wrangling during a summer session.

Adjournment before the conventions is the only reasonable course that Congress can take. Let the leaders of the Senate map out a course for the disposition of each essential bill and hold rigidly to that schedule until its business is completed.

NATIONAL PROBLEMS—ADDRESS BY FORMER GOV. ALFRED E. SMITH

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the wide interest manifested by the public and Members of the Congress I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech on national problems delivered over the National Broadcasting network on Monday, May 16, by former Gov. Alfred E. Smith.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the crisis now confronting our country the Government itself, like every other human line of endeavor, is in trouble. At the beginning of the present session of Congress, on advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, the President certified to Congress a shortage of $1,200,000,000 between the estimated receipts and the estimated expenditures for the year 1933. It became therefore the duty of Congress, acting upon the advice of the President, to devise ways and means, either by increase of existing forms of taxation or the establishment of new forms, to insure sufficient revenue to meet the estimated cost.

The first duty of the Congress, exercising ordinary, good business judgment, is to use every means at its command to reduce the cost of the Government. I believe it to be the duty of every Member of Congress, without fear or favor, to go to the extreme limit in slashing from the appropriation bills all unnecessary appropriations of the public money. Every item not absolutely essential to the proper conduct of governmental business should be eliminated.

ACTION BY CONGRESS UNSATISFACTORY

So far the action taken by Congress with respect to reorganization of the Federal Government is not, to my mind, satisfactory. Congress can not give this matter the study and thought to which it is entitled. Under present conditions reorganization must be an executive and not a legislative function, and I am therefore in favor of giving to the President the full responsibility and power which he has asked in the immediate consolidation of Government activities and bureaus and in other ways to reduce the cost of Government. The compromises so far offered by Congress are inadequate. They will not produce either economy or reorganization, and will lead to endless wrangles as to the responsibility for failure.

One of the most important fields of economy in which the general public is just beginning to take a lively interest is the revision of the laws relating to veterans. While I bow to no one in my reverence for and devotion to the men who in the hour of national peril offered themselves to the country, I nevertheless hold, and I believe that a majority of the veterans themselves hold with me, that we should call a halt to veteran legislation and check up before we go any farther. No group of patriots can properly ask that their care shall become a national burden greater than the people of the country can carry in times of trouble.

Let us go back to the principles of the wise and far-sighted plans set forth by President Wilson in his program for payments to soldiers. He was a student of history. He sought above all things to avoid the evils of soldiers' pensions which followed the Civil War.

He began by obtaining a scale of pay for men in the service higher than any scale ever paid before in this or any other country. He established as a further part of this program the principles of full and complete care of those wounded or disabled during the war, or whose disabilities are traceable to the war; full care and protection for widows and orphans of soldiers who lost their lives in the war; and a system of insurance and deferred compensation for all veterans on a sound actuarial basis with contributions by the Government and the veterans.

This program was entirely acceptable to veterans and to the people generally, and was regarded everywhere as the most generous plan ever offered of governmental cooperation in the compensation and care of soldiers and their dependents in this or in any other country.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED SINCE

What has happened since Wilson's retirement as President? Not only have Federal and State bonuses been provided but the Wilson principles have practically been destroyed by numerous amendments to veterans' laws, all of which have for their purpose the payment of hundreds of millions of dollars to hundreds of thousands of veterans and their dependents, whose disabilities and other problems are not remotely connected with the war. Much of this huge sum is being paid, in fact, to men who never saw active service and to dependents who have no legitimate claim on the Government.

The country simply can not afford to appropriate these huge sums in a time of crisis for a favored class. As a matter of fact, by gradual changes in these laws, we are now paying large sums every year to over 300,000 veterans whose disabilities resulted from other than military or naval service. I take these figures from a document recently issued by a group of veterans themselves.

I therefore suggest that Congress appoint a special committee to report back at the next session a list of all special acts, amendments, and appropriations which in any way compromise the original Wilson principles with a view to the repeal of such legislation. In the meantime, no more burdens for veteran relief should be added by Congress at this session.

Holding this view, it seems unnecessary for me to say that I believe nothing should be done with regard to revision of the bonus bill at this session of Congress. The plan to pay immediately compensation not due for a number of years is made more obnoxious when accompanied by the suggestion that it be paid by the issuance of fiat money. I am sure that upon consideration the great majority of veterans will approve this and will manifest their willingness to bear their share of the national burden.

PRESENT TASK BEFORE CONGRESS

After Congress has boned the appropriation bills to the irreducible minimum there remains the question of seeking sufficient revenue by taxation to meet the estimated cost of operating the Government during 1933. At the time of the convening of the present Congress estimates of the Treasury Department indicated a shortage of $1,200,000,000. Since then Congress has added to the appropriations, and falling receipts indicate that the actual difference will be in excess of $1,500,000,000, and there is no assurance that it will not exceed that amount. Let us face the facts. The burden rests upon Congress to find new means of revenue which will positively produce at least $1,500,000,000.

It is important in the imposition of new and additional taxes required to balance the Budget that no greater strain be put upon industry or business than is absolutely necessary, and in any event that no strain be imposed which will operate to retard the return of prosperity. Moreover, any strain which is imposed should be fairly and evenly distributed over all business, all industry, and all occupations and callings. That is good, sound American principle. In other words, the desirable thing to do at the present moment is to broaden the base of taxation so that the whole country will bear its full and just share of the burden.

This leads me to the frank and honest statement that I believe in the general manufacturers' sales tax to meet the emergency. I think it was a mistake for Congress to turn it down. I think it should be reconsidered, and I hazard the guess that a clear majority in Congress in their hearts believe in a temporary general manufacturers' sales tax at this time.

HOW THE TAX WOULD WORK

Much has been said about the manufacturers' sales tax, but I am a little afraid that it is not thoroughly understood by the man on the street. For that reason I believe it will be helpful to cite some figures. Take, for example, the man who spends $1,000 a year; that is, $83 a month. I would take that to be the expenditure of probably the average family head among the working classes of this country. Studies indicate that $700 of that $1,000 is for shelter, food, clothing, and other things, which, under the provision of the manufacturers' sales tax bill, are not taxable, leaving only $300 of his $1,000 expenditure to be subject to sales taxation.

A sales tax such as had been proposed would have required him to pay less than $8 a year, and I deny emphatically that there is such a lack of patriotism and devotion to this country at a time like this that any considerable number of men in position to expend $1,000 a year are unwilling to contribute $8 of it to the support of the Federal Government.

Aside from every other consideration it would be a healthy thing at a time like this, because it would encourage a great many thousands, if not millions, of people to study the financial operation of their Government, which they would surely do if they were direct contributors to its support.

All during my life and public career I have stood by the ordinary citizen of limited means and limited earning power. I shall never change that attitude. I came from this class, and I shall never forget it, and for this reason I can not give my approval to the false friend who leads the workingman to believe that his condition in life can be bettered by the slogan attributed by the press to those who opposed the manufacturers' sales tax: "In order to make up the deficit—soak the rich."

That means soak capital, and you can not soak capital without soaking labor at the same time. They are bound together. One is essential to the other. The success of one means the success of the other. The destruction of one means the destruction of the other. It is a false friend who leads the poor man to believe that capital can be unreasonably taxed or soaked without injury to him. In prosperous times labor does not receive the largest share of the profits of industry; therefore in a depression like the present it is right enough that capital should bear a larger share of the burden. Of course, capital must bear the main burden of taxation, but it should never be an unfair burden.

A HOMELY EXAMPLE

Let me give you a homely example: Mr. Railroad needs $50,000,000 to electrify his main line. He must go to Mr. Capital for the money, and Mr. Capital will say to Mr. Railroad, "What will you give me for the loan of this money?" And Mr. Railroad will say, "Five per cent gilt-edge first-mortgage bonds of our system." If the false friend of the poor man who suggests that we soak capital has his way about it, Mr. Capital will be compelled to say to Mr. Railroad:

"No. I can not lend you the money. While you promise me 5 per cent, there is a third party to the transaction known as Mr. Government, and he is going to take from me a large part of what I earn. If, on the other hand, instead of lending to you, Mr. Railroad, I lend to Mr. Government, Mr. Government will not tax me. I can put my money into State, municipal, or Federal Government securities and can be left undisturbed in the enjoyment of the full income growing therefrom. Instead of going into partnership with you, I propose to go in with Mr. Government."

Thereupon Mr. Capital deserts Mr. Railroad, and Mr. Railroad, in turn, is compelled to turn his back on the thousands of men who would be required in mine, shop, mill, and factory to produce, fabricate, and transport the equipment necessary for the electrification, plus the thousands of men now out of employment who would be engaged in its installation.

This same story can be recited all along the line. Soak capital and you soak labor. Confiscatory taxation of capital prevents the flow of money into industry. The greater and freer the flow of capital, the quicker industry will revive, and the quicker widespread unemployment will cease. The demagogue won't agree to that, but it's true just the same.

As a result of the attempt of Congress to impose taxes upon a few industries and forms of business, the representatives of these industries and business groups are fighting to be relieved of tax burdens. The only way I know of to discourage the operation of the special groups which infest the lobbies of Congress seeking either special favor or immunity is to impose temporarily a manufacturers' sales tax. It may not be good politics in the view of some people, to say this, but it is good patriotism, and that in the end is the only kind of politics which the people of this country will stand for in a time of emergency.

THE PEOPLE AGAINST PROHIBITION

Throughout the length and breadth of the land to-day there emanates from all classes of our people an insistent demand that something be done about the present laws, both constitutional and statutory, with respect to prohibition. The people have awakened to the fact that prohibition is not workable, that it does not prohibit, and that liquor and malted beverages are flowing throughout the country in as great a volume as they did prior to the enactment of the eighteenth amendment.

Pending action by the party conventions determining party policy with respect to modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment, it is within the power of Congress to put a more liberal interpretation by statute on what constitutes an intoxicant. The immediate passage of an amendment to the so-called Volstead Act, legalizing light wines and beer and providing for their taxation, will produce a revenue of hundreds of millions of dollars and at the same time tax something that the Government always taxed and which is to-day escaping all forms of taxation and pursuing its business with as much vigor as it did at any time during the history of the country. Aside from the revenue-producing features, it would help materially to relieve the unemployment situation.

For several months I have spoken and written repeatedly of the necessity for a bond issue to progress productive national and local public works in order to cure unemployment, stimulate business generally, increase purchasing power, and restore our national morale.

More and more people are coming to this point of view. Men who can hardly be called visionaries—sound business men—have recently taken the same position. Talk will not solve unemployment. Immediate help is what is needed. We have already waited so long that if we do not take action quickly I doubt whether relief can come in time to be of use in the months that lie just ahead.

Millions of dollars of public money have already been expended on employment relief of little value. Certainly the so-called "made work," which consists of employing men on the basis of their family needs on all kinds of odd jobs without proper plans, material, or supervision, is a disguised dole and a waste of public funds. I have seen hundreds of men pulling up weeds and fixing shoulders of roads which three months from now will look just as they did before the men began working. This kind of labor produces nothing of permanent value. We have had enough of it.

Everything which has come to my attention on the subject of unemployment since I suggested a relief bond issue confirms my opinion that unemployment and relief of the distress it has caused can not be solved by merely throwing them back on the States and municipalities.

PUBLIC WORKS BOND PLAN

My original recommendations contemplated that the Federal Government would issue public works bonds for four purposes:

1. For an expanded program of Federal improvements.
2. For additional Federal highway aid to the States.
3. To advance money to limited dividend housing corporations for construction of low-cost housing.
4. For the purchase by the Federal Government of bonds of States and municipalities issued by these local governments for local public-works projects of long life and permanent value. Only public improvements, for which plans were completed or under way or for which plans could be quickly prepared, were to be financed in this way.

I further suggested that the President be empowered to appoint a public-works administrator, clothed with the power to progress public improvements of all kinds without reference to the many regulatory statutes which now contribute to the red tape and delay incident to Government work. There are numerous Federal public buildings and works throughout the country which have been authorized by Congress but for which no appropriations have actually been made. These could be put under way promptly. In addition there is at least $500,000,000 in the 1933 Budget for Federal public improvements which could be built from the proceeds of the sale of bonds and thus relieve the overburdened taxpayer.

Why should we not have a Federal-aid highway program at least as great as last year's, instead of one only one-fourth as great? New York for example, has the smallest highway program this year since the war. Last year it had the largest.

Some time ago the President recommended that Congress provide by legislation for substantial Federal aid for low-cost housing. The President has not referred to the subject again, although all other legislation recommended at that time has long since been disposed of.

NEW FEDERAL RELIEF PROGRAM

Within the last week the leaders at Washington have suddenly concluded that something must be done to speed the relief program.

After an informal conference with the leaders of both parties in Congress, the President has issued a statement proposing a 3-point Federal relief program for unemployment, in which he proposed:

1. That authority be granted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to assist States by underwriting State bonds or by loaning directly to them for relief purposes to an amount not exceeding a total of $300,000,000.
2. That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation underwrite or make loans upon proper security for income-producing and self-sustaining enterprises which will increase employment, whether undertaken by public or private enterprise, provided also that these enterprises furnish part of the capital and promise early and substantial employment.
3. That the borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be increased to $3,000,000,000.

The President pointed out that he distinguished sharply between the use of capital for these enterprises on the one hand and unproductive public works on the other, and that the projects he proposed to aid were of a self-liquidating character not constituting a charge against the taxpayers or public funds. He stated further that he was opposed to increasing Federal construction work beyond the amounts already appropriated.

I presume that the President's statement is merely a starting point for discussion. The President says he does not propose to issue Federal bonds. Of course, that does not mean anything, because by increasing the capital of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, he would authorize that corporation either to sell its securities, which are backed by the full credit of the United States Government, to the public, or to sell them to the United States Treasury and the Federal reserve banks or to borrow from these, which is precisely the same thing under another name.

I am also unable to follow the President's reasoning as to additional Federal improvements because the President himself has signed bills in which he authorized numerous improvements not included in the 1933 Budget. Are we to assume that all authorized improvements, many of which are being designed, including post offices, Federal buildings, and other projects, are wasteful? If they are needed, why not have them now?

ROAD CONSTRUCTION ADVANTAGES

I know of no field of public improvements in which results can be obtained so quickly and on which so many men can be employed promptly as on road construction. The entire huge budget for Federal highway aid to the States last year was actually expended in the time contemplated by the various States to which the money was advanced. If this could be done in the past year, why can it not be done again?

Of course, if the aid to be extended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is limited to revenue-producing improvements, then all such projects as highways and practically all State and municipal improvements will be excluded. Many of these improvements are truly productive even if they do not produce revenue. It is absurd to measure the productiveness of an improvement by the amount of revenue it brings in directly.

As for the financing of private revenue-producing enterprises under the guise of remedying unemployment, I am radically opposed to this, and I think most of the people of the country will be. It will lead to all kinds of logrolling and favoritism, and there are plenty of worth-while public improvements ready to go ahead which should receive Federal aid before private business is subsidized.

Personally I doubt very much whether the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the right agency to which to entrust the public works and unemployment problems. The confusion in the President's mind is due to his attempt to use an agency created to bolster up private credit as an administrative body to progress public works. If the President wants to stimulate employment by public works, he must make his plan conform to the facts and not attempt to create overnight an entirely new body of State and municipal law based upon theories applicable to private and not to public business.

The notion that municipalities throughout the country may, under existing law, furnish part of the capital for a self-supporting improvement and then borrow the rest from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is directly contrary to the constitutions, statutes, and practices of almost every State and municipality throughout the country. Only specially created instrumentalities like the Port of New York Authority can follow that procedure.

OFFER OF LOANS TO STATES

Even the offer to lend money to States will be entirely ineffective. New York State, for example, under its constitution may contract a debt only in anticipation of taxes, to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or defend the State in time of war, and to fight forest fires. Otherwise all debts can only be created by legislative action plus popular referendum. Most of the States of the Union have such constitutional restrictions, and the same limitations apply to most cities, counties, towns, and villages.

The fact remains that the States and municipalities simply can not borrow from the Federal Government, no matter how much it might wish to lend. The most the Federal Government can do is to buy their securities after investigation as to their soundness and thus create a market almost wholly lacking under present conditions. This policy I have long advocated.

Rather than limit unemployment relief in the way suggested by the President, I would strongly recommend that the President be given a free hand to provide Federal aid for productive public works of States and municipalities, as well as for additional Federal projects, which will bring about the early employment of the largest possible number of men. The broader and more flexible the power given the President to accomplish these things at this time, the better it will be. It is not a mistake during times of stress and crisis to clothe the President with this plenary power to equip him to fight the war against unemployment and all the other evils which follow in its wake.

The proceeds of the sales and beer taxes will not only provide for the existing deficiencies but will undoubtedly produce revenue sufficient to pay the interest and amortize any public-works bonds which may be issued by the President during the next fiscal year.

ACTION ON WAR DEBTS URGED

On the 13th of April in Washington I suggested a plan to liquidate the war debts owed to this country by foreign governments. I earnestly believe that it will be a mistake for Congress to adjourn and leave this matter hanging in the air. The 1-year general debt and reparation moratorium negotiated by President Hoover last year expires in a few weeks, and while it is true that payments are not due until December, the world at large will be in a state of doubt, uncertainty, and apprehension during that period unless some one is authorized to speak for us.

Here again, temporarily and to meet the emergency, I believe Congress should empower the President to meet the situation as he once did without congressional authorization, and, if necessary, to prolong that moratorium until a real solution can be reached.

Certainly, the rider attached by Congress to the act approving the moratorium should be repealed, because it constitutes a threat to the President not to take any similar action in the matter without the consent of Congress until 1933. It leaves the country without a spokesman at a critical time. And, incidentally, let me say here that this spokesman may be called upon to overlook payment of our foreign debts for the simple reason that they are not going to be paid, the foreign governments having made no provision for them in their own budgets. It is senseless to count chickens which will never be hatched.

APPEAL TO CONGRESS MEMBERS

In conclusion, I believe that it is the patriotic duty of every Member of Congress from now until adjournment to discourage and avoid in every possible way all blocs, cabals, insurgencies, and mugwump tactics, by whatever name they may be called, which bedevil legislation, increase the depression, unsettle business, and endanger our credit at home and abroad.

Let every Member of Congress think of what is best for the country at large, even though it may not seem at the moment to be popular with the boys back home. The time has come for us to pull together like one great united people, to put our financial house in order. The prompt enactment of a complete and honest financial program and the balancing of our Budget are subjects above politics and sectionalism.

There are plenty of subjects to be discussed during the summer by conventions and candidates. Let us cooperate now and argue afterwards.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, let me enumerate the proposals contained in the amendment presented by the Senator from Maryland.

First. The amendment proposes a modification of the Volstead Act by fixing the alcoholic content of beverages containing alcohol at 2.75 per cent instead of one-half of 1 per cent, which is the present law.

Second. The amendment proposes to levy a tax of 24 cents per gallon upon beverage of the alcoholic content named.

Third. The income derived from the beverage of the alcoholic content mentioned, known as beer, is to be collected and deposited in a special Treasury fund.

Fourth. It is estimated that from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 can be raised annually from this tax and placed in the special Treasury fund.

Fifth. The amendment provides for a bond issue of $1,500,000,000, the proceeds of which are to be used to construct public works which the Congress has already authorized and which will be built in any event within the next 10 or 15 years. In addition to the amount authorized by Congress for construction of public works, the amendment provides an additional $400,000,000 for good roads, river and harbor projects, and for flood-control work. This makes a total of $1,300,000,000.

Sixth. The remaining $200,000,000 of the bond issue is to be disposed of as follows: The sum of $150,000,000 is to be set aside to make annual payments upon the bond issue covering a period of 15 years, and the sum of $50,000,000 is to be set aside to meet the annual interest requirement, which sum is to be taken from this tax as it is deposited in the Treasury fund.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if the amendment now pending is to take the place of the proposal outlined by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few days ago?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will ask the proponent of the amendment, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], to answer the question of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has a copy of the amendment in his hand, I take it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. If he will look at the date he will find that it was presented on April 19, which was, I think, long before either the Senator from Arkansas or President Hoover had taken any position along the lines the Senator indicates. The amendment was presented at that time with the thought that no other program, perhaps, would be presented.

Mr. BORAH. Then, may I ask, in case this amendment should be adopted and become a part of the law it would not be necessary to deal with the unemployment question further?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not say that the amendment would provide an absolute cure; but I would say that it is in line with the general program advanced for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. We certainly would not want to issue bonds to the extent of $1,500,000,000 and then issue bonds under the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas to the amount of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that is sound. I may say to the Senator from Idaho that I thought the virtue of the amendment which the Senator has in his hand, presented by me, is that it provides a sure way to amortize the bond issue, whereas some of the other proposals are more or less speculative as to how the money is to be obtained to pay for the bond issue suggested.

Mr. BORAH. What I am anxious to know is whether we are now discussing what is to be the ultimate plan with reference to taking care of unemployment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should think, if the amendment is adopted, that, so far as the construction program is concerned, it would be the ultimate plan.

Mr. BORAH. Then the other suggestions about issuing bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000 would likely be obviated.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I understand that no bill has been presented as yet outlining the proposals contained in the speech recently made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BORAH. No; but I understand that such a bill is being formulated and prepared for introduction by a committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is correct.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland raises, first of all, the question of just what the Senate desires to do in the way of modifying the Volstead Act. If there has been any apparent change in public sentiment upon any public question during recent months, it seems to me it is most noticeable in the case of the expanding movement throughout the country for a modification of the Volstead Act.

I have been surprised at the extent to which correspondents have appealed to me for some action in the direction proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. Groups of constituents who never before appeared to be interested in this subject have very strongly urged that action be taken by the Congress toward the modification of the Volstead law. It may be propaganda; but the fact remains, nevertheless, that citizens who heretofore were disinterested in this subject, who refrained from taking sides or from making recommendations on this subject to the Congress, are doing so to-day in larger numbers than ever before.

Mr. President, the sentiment in favor of changing the Volstead Act is growing at a tremendous pace; and I find that this sentiment comes from industrial leaders as well as the masses of the people, who have long been favorable, especially in the industrial centers, to legislation providing for legalizing beer with small alcoholic content.

Practically every letter that comes to me outlining a new economic program to lift the country out of the depression includes action in favor of the modification of the Volstead Act. I need not comment upon recent elections in this country and the evidence they furnish of a very marked change in the former attitude of the general public toward this question.

This amendment presents an opportunity for those Members of the Senate who believe that the time has come for a modification of the Volstead law to register their position.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] in his speech of yesterday presented overwhelming testimony to the effect that this alcoholic content would not be construed by the courts to be intoxicating. It was pointed out, also, that the statutes of the several States prior to the enactment of the national prohibition amendment provided that beverages with an alcoholic content of less than 3 per cent were not intoxicating.

So we have, first of all, the straight issue of whether or not the Senate desires to record itself in favor of a modification of the Volstead law. Indeed, the Senator's amendment proposes to place a tax upon and give legal character to a practice that is widespread in this country to-day; namely, that of manufacturing, transporting, and selling a beverage of the alcoholic content named in the amendment without paying any taxes. There is no need of arguing that proposition at length. The Senator from Maryland went into the matter most extensively in his able speech of last night.

If this amendment is adopted, the Federal Treasury will receive a tremendous sum of money by taxing a beverage that was taxed before prohibition, that is now escaping taxation, and it is a tax that has been during many years recognized as a less burdensome tax than many of the others imposed or proposed to be imposed. Indeed, it is a tax that has been levied in connection with the taxes upon tobacco, and has been looked upon by all our people as a legitimate and reasonable way of receiving large revenue for the Public Treasury.

Those Members of this body who have reached the conclusion that the time is here to register the sentiment of the country in favor of a modification of the Volstead Act can do so by voting for this amendment, and in addition provide for turning into the Public Treasury a very substantial increase in revenue, and permitting that revenue to be used for a very praiseworthy and commendable object, namely, that designated in the amendment.

The second feature of the amendment is the provision for using the money collected under this tax for the relief of unemployment. It provides for a bond issue that is self-liquidating. It provides for a bond issue that will not disturb the present bond market, as it would be disturbed by placing upon the market Federal bonds which were not self-liquidating, and which it is generally conceded would be likely to have a very detrimental effect upon the value of the outstanding bonds owned by our people and financial institutions throughout the country.

Practically every one who has considered the question of a bond issue for the relief of unemployment has agreed that the most desirable—indeed, the most necessary—course for us to pursue is to provide for the liquidating of the bond issue in the law authorizing a bond issue. This measure does that. This measure defines the way and provides the means for paying off the bond issue within the life of the bonds that are proposed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the Senator that on the 10th of June, which is not very far away, it is quite likely that Congress will at least take a recess over the period of the conventions, and that the amount of business now pending before the Congress is such that it would be very difficult to get consideration of any other measure to take care of the emergency which now exists prior to the 10th of June. We can consider this one proposition now, because it is in order; but if it is defeated, it means that no other emergency measure looking to starting our construction program can pass Congress and be put into effect until, perhaps, August. That being so, it would be next winter, in my judgment, before the construction program got under way. It seems to me that the present amendment has the virtue, if adopted, of permitting the construction program to be started in the very, very near future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Maryland believe that Congress will adjourn or take a recess until some plan for caring for the unemployment situation is provided for?

Mr. TYDINGS. No. I said that on the 10th of June we would likely take a recess——

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator believe we will take a recess until we have passed a bill of that nature?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish. I do not think we will adjourn until we have passed a bill of that nature; no. I thought, however, that if we did not pass the bill until July or August it would be next fall or winter before we could get a construction program under way; whereas if it is adopted now, the wheels could be put in motion within a month, so that long before next fall and winter descend upon us we would have this construction program under way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is not an argument against the Senator's amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand.

Mr. BORAH. But it is to say that I can not conceive of Congress adjourning or recessing until they have passed upon this question. It would be an act of poltroonery and betrayal of the public interest that could hardly be measured in language.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that what I rose to point out was simply that if something can be done now it will take a couple of months or three months to get any construction program under way; and if we do not take action upon some other program until July or August, it will be September or October before we get the thing operating.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but just imagine the situation: Here are the two old parties—really, the only two parties in existence in the United States—having absolute control of the Congress of the United States, going to Chicago and asking for the confidence of the American people, asking the American people to intrust either of them with power for the next four years, and going there without any program to take care of the situation that now confronts the country; not only unemployment but other questions. If anything would call into existence a third party, or a political revolution, that would.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to say that I am in entire accord and agreement with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Idaho. It is inconceivable that Congress will adjourn without providing some means of taking care of the present situation, and which would include some means of supporting the burdens of the States which are taking care of those in want and those in need in their borders.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I know of no effort being made on the part of anybody to adjourn Congress until after the passage of appropriate legislation along the lines suggested. I am not certain, however, that that means the legislation proposed by the Senator from Maryland. Some legislation along that line must be passed, and I think everybody concurs in that sentiment.

Mr. BORAH. Then it is understood that there is to be no effort to adjourn Congress or to take a recess until we shall have passed a measure dealing with the subject of unemployment?

Mr. WATSON. So far as I am concerned, that is the situation.

Mr. BORAH. This talk about the 10th of June is dependent entirely upon whether or not we get through with our program of legislation?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; the program of passing the tax bill, and the economy plan, and unemployment legislation, and all the appropriation bills.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. May I ask the Senator from Indiana whether or not any of the economy plans he has suggested include giving any more money to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of helping some of the industries of the country, such as the Willys-Overland Automobile Co., or some of those concerns?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator from Montana that that plan has not yet been worked out.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope it will not be worked out, because if there is going to be any more money given there is one thing that ought to be done, and that is there ought to be some money to help to refinance the farmers who have mortgages upon their land who can not possibly pay them; and they will have to repudiate their indebtedness unless this Congress acts. We should act to help the farmers before any more appropriations are taken out of the Treasury of the United States either for any banking group or for any other business organizations in this country.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire of the Senator from Indiana where the Government is to get the money to do these things?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Maryland is now proposing a plan by which we can get some money.

Mr. GLASS. I apprehended that the Senator's answer would be that we would get it by taxation; and who is to be taxed?

Mr. WATSON. How else are we to get it except by taxation?

Mr. GLASS. Exactly; by taxing the people of 48 States and bringing the money here and impounding it in the Federal Treasury, and then doling it out to them. Why not let the States levy their own taxes and take care of their own unemployed?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, it is not up to me to answer that now, because it involves very much of argument and disputation. Of course, I do believe that it is up to the General Government to enact some form of unemployment relief. I can not go into that now. The plan has not yet been formulated, but will be, I am told, shortly. I understand that the Senator's party, or certain individuals representing it, are working out some sort of a plan which they can support.

Mr. GLASS. I am not talking about any party plan now.

Mr. WATSON. I am talking about a plan we can all support.

Mr. GLASS. I want to satisfy my own mind about these matters; and I will say, incidentally, that I would rather trust the people of Virginia to levy their own taxes and take care of their own unemployed than to have them taxed and their money brought here to Washington and doled back to them for political purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator when he adds the last clause, "for political purposes." I agree with that entirely. I know perfectly well that some of the States have reached the limit, and some of the cities have reached the limit, and it is simply a question of whether the National Government will aid and cooperate with them to such an extent as to prevent actual suffering and starvation.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that taxes are to be put upon the citizens of those States which have reached the limit.

Mr. WATSON. I understand there are some six or seven States which have reached the limit of statutory indebtedness, and while they are not in a position to issue bonds some device will be formulated or some plan entered into which will enable them to do so.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and the Federal Government will levy taxes on their citizens and take their money away from them and bring it here to Washington, and then appoint some Federal minion to dole it back to them as they may, from whim or judgment, mostly whim, and a political whim at that.

Mr. BORAH. Most of the taxation in the States is now falling upon property, and it is falling upon property regardless of whether that property returns an income or not; and they have reached the limit upon that proposition.

We have not reached the limit in the United States, and I am in favor of reaching the limit with reference to the National Government and the State governments before people shall be permitted to starve to death.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and I am in favor of taking the money from the other 47 States and bringing it here to Washington, if anybody wants to do that; but I am opposed to taking the money of the Virginia taxpayers for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think all are agreed, in connection with this subject of relief, that the time has arrived for the Federal Government to render some assistance to those States which are unable to carry the burden which has fallen on them by reason of the tremendous increase in welfare expenditures.

The first thing we ought to do—and there ought to be no delay in doing it—is to carry out the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, which, I understand, meets the approval of the President, namely, the appropriation of $300,000,000 to be loaned to the several States, particularly to those States which furnish evidence that they are unable to raise sufficient funds to meet the requirements of those in need or in want.

Mr. President, I want my views about the manner in which that relief is to be extended made clear. I am opposed to the Federal Government having any dealings or connection or operations with municipalities as such. The cities and towns of this country are subdivisions of the several States. In my judgment, the Federal Government has no business dealing or negotiating with a municipality, any more than with a ward of a municipality. It seems to me the agencies of relief should begin and remain in the local communities, which know what citizens are in need, which know what they need, and which know best how to distribute the supplies which they may be required to have in order to sustain existence.

I do claim that the moment a municipality or community is unable to meet its obligations—and there are many that are not able to meet the increased burden—they should then turn to their State governments and ask their State governments to help share and meet those obligations. The Senator from Indiana said there are now six, or approximately six, State governments which are unable to raise the funds to meet the requirements, and in such case I think the Federal Government must act. It must raise the necessary money to prevent any suffering, any want, any starvation in any State where it exists. It seems to me that obligation can not be denied. But I insist that the Federal Government keep its agents and keep its activities out of the local communities. Let its program, let its contacts, let its cooperation, be always between the several States and the Federal Government. Let the States handle, direct, and supervise those subdivisions for which they are responsible, which are their creatures, which are their own wards. The State is the parent of each of these subdivisions.

That does not mean that the Federal Government has not a responsibility, a grave and a serious one, the moment a State says, "There are communities in this State which can not meet its obligations to those in need." Then the Federal Government must act by offering support to the States that find the burden crushing, but it must not do it by sending agents, sending inspectors, sending people who know nothing about the local situation and the local needs. The money must go from the Federal Treasury to the State treasury, and from the State treasury to the various municipalities.

It seems to me that the first step, upon which we all can agree, which we can now settle with practical unanimity of opinion here, is that the Federal Government should say to the States, "We are now ready to assist you in order that there may be no suffering or starving."

Why attach the relief proposition to any other proposal? Why not have such a bill separately presented to us, and let us not get it confused with the question of a bond issue, and whether the bond issue shall be self-liquidating or not?

I hope that the committee on this side of the Chamber who are drafting a bill will present that issue without any other, so that Congress can without delay say to the several States, "We are behind you. We understand the burden under which you are suffering. We appreciate it, and we are not going to interfere with your method of handling and distributing relief. That is your own problem. But if you say to us that you have not the financial resources necessary to meet these obligations, the Federal Government stands ready to lend you whatever may be needed." It seems to me that is a very simple way of disposing of the question of relief to the unemployed, who are in actual need and are suffering.

As to the question of a bond issue for public works, it is quite apparent that there is a very wide difference of opinion not only in this Chamber but between the executive branch and the Congress. So far as I am concerned, I would much prefer to see a bond issue authorized which would provide for its liquidation, such as is proposed by the Senator from Maryland. This method must be followed if at all possible. That is why I am supporting his amendment. But I want to say very frankly that if the situation arises where a bond issue is needed, in the interest of stabilizing our social problems, I propose to vote for a bond issue which will provide employment upon public works for as many of our citizens as it may be possible to take care of if public works can be undertaken that are not wasteful or in the nature of luxury undertakings.

Mr. President, I want to repeat that I am in favor of the pending amendment, because it is the first opportunity we have had in this Chamber to declare for a modification of the Volstead law within the provisions of the Constitution. I am frank to say to the Senator from Maryland and other Senators that, in my judgment, any attempt to fix an alcoholic content in excess of that named in this amendment would be of doubtful constitutionality. No serious question has been raised here about the constitutionality of the alcoholic content named in the Senator's amendment. It seems to me he has given very ample proof that it is not intoxicating, and the best proof of all is that this percentage of content was accepted almost unanimously by the people of the United States through the statutes of the several States that fixed an alcoholic content of less than 3 per cent as nonintoxicating. We have an opportunity now to declare for a modification of the Volstead law, to raise money for the Public Treasury at a time when the Public Treasury needs money, to raise it by making manufacture of beer legal, bring it out in the open, and make it possible to collect taxes from those who are making that beverage, instead of permitting them to escape, as they have been doing in these recent years or instead of taxing it surreptitiously as we are now doing by the excise tax on wort.

Next, we have an opportunity here to vote for a bond issue for the unemployed, in which is provided the means of paying off the bond issue by the taxes collected from the legalizing of beer.

I take special satisfaction in approving of the amendment, and I hope the Members of the Senate will consider the opportunity that is theirs to render what seem to me to be two distinct public services, to permit the manufacture of a beverage that is within the terms of the Constitution and only illegal now because the alcoholic content named in the Volstead law is one-half of 1 per cent instead of 2.75 per cent; and also to provide means for taking care of the unemployed with the least shock to the finances of the country and with the least burden to the taxpayers.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, because of the press of important measures before the Senate and the limited time within which to give them consideration I had not expected to discuss the pending amendment, but yesterday evening the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] made a statement which I shall try to demonstrate is not a true one or based upon facts. The Senator stated that to support the Tydings amendment would be a violation of the oath that we take here and a violation of the Constitution. By reviewing the history of the legislation very briefly I shall make an effort to show that that is not based upon the actual historical facts connected with the Volstead law and any amendment thereto.

First I wish to invite attention to the fact that at the time the eighteenth amendment was submitted to the people of the United States it was during war time when it was legal to sell beers containing 2.75 per cent of alcoholic content. Those who framed the eighteenth amendment and those who supported it are the same people who wrote the Volstead law. They were acquainted with the objects and purposes of the limitations which they had in mind when they prepared and submitted the eighteenth amendment. We find that the Volstead law did not place any limitations on the alcoholic content of beer and wine.

At page 4334, volume 61, part 5, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be found a letter which I read into the RECORD on July 27, 1921, addressed by a Member of Congress to Mr. Roper, who was the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This letter was written on January 21, 1920. I wish to read the letter at this time so that everyone here will be taken back to the time and into the atmosphere of those who proposed the law. The various Members of the House and Senate who submitted the eighteenth amendment and then the Volstead law understood the purpose and intent of the constitutional amendment. I now read the letter to which I have just referred:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, January 21, 1920.

Hon. DANIEL C. ROPER,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROPER: A constituent of mine has asked me for a ruling on the following matter, which does not seem to be covered clearly by the Volstead Act.

Is it possible to manufacture an ale containing perhaps 4 or 5 per cent of alcohol, this ale to be manufactured and placed on sale as a medicinal product? If so, what regulations would govern the manufacture and sale of this product?

Your attention is called to the Volstead Act, section 7, in which it is stated that only a physician holding a permit to prescribe liquor shall issue any prescription for liquor. The word "liquor" used here, I suppose, also means malt liquors. However, a little farther down in the same section it is stated:

"Not more than a pint of spirituous liquors to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days, and no prescription shall be filled more than once."

Malt liquors are, of course, not spirituous liquors. I shall appreciate greatly an immediate ruling on this matter.

Yours sincerely,

———— ————.

To which Mr. John F. Kramer, Prohibition Commissioner, replied on January 27, 1920. This letter, as I then stated, was addressed to a Member of Congress who was a member of the Ways and Means Committee and whose name I withheld at the time, but whose name I offered then to disclose if anybody cared to have it and which I can do now. The reply was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
OFFICE OF FEDERAL PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER,
Washington, January 27, 1920.

Hon. ———— ————
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ————: Replying to your communication of the 21st instant, you are advised that under the national prohibition act liquor may be prescribed by a physician when necessary, and the limit on such sales is not to exceed 1 pint for the same patient during a period of 10 days. Undoubtedly under said act it is legal to prescribe malt liquors, such as beer, ale, and porter, for medicinal purposes in such quantity as the physician who is in attendance upon the patient deems necessary for the patient's relief. The matter of fixing a limit as to the quantity of malt liquors and wine that may be prescribed is now under consideration, and it is expected that a decision will be reached at an early date, when the public will be fully advised in the premises.

Beer or wine should be prescribed by the physician, and the prescription filled by the pharmacist in the manner now provided by regulation No. 60 for spirituous (distilled) liquor, but it will be understood that the pint limitation is not applicable to the malt liquor and wine.

A copy of the Treasury Department decision in question is inclosed.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. KRAMER,
Prohibition Commissioner.

When this letter was written there had not been any opinion rendered by the Department of Justice on this question. The commissioner had, to quote from his letter, "now under consideration, and it is expected that a decision will be reached at an early date."

About 10 days before Attorney General Palmer went out of office he was asked for a ruling on the question. It was not expected that he would have time to submit an opinion before going out of office, but on the 3d of March, 1921, the day before he went out of office, he issued an opinion, which is recorded in volume 32 of the opinions of Attorneys General. It, therefore, became necessary for the friends of those who insisted that the eighteenth amendment should be made to apply and that the Volstead Act should be made to apply in all respects to the limitation of one-half of 1 per cent, to enact some additional legislation.

I had opposed the eighteenth amendment when it was submitted to the people of my State. In 1920 I offered for United States Senator and submitted to my people a modification plank, as we called it, relating to the Volstead law. I came here and found my friends here were trying to dissuade me from going into the question because it had never been brought up on the floor of the Senate or House after its adoption by the several States. But when the Campbell-Willis bill was brought out in 1921 I was confronted with the question of having to carry out my promise to my people and so I started a fight in this Chamber in the early part of 1921.

The Campbell-Willis bill was known as the antibeer bill finally because, although intended at first to limit prescriptions by physicians of wine and beer, it was later decided to eliminate beer altogether; and although it was claimed here that if we had a right to limit the right to prescribe whisky we could also deny or limit the right to prescribe any quantity of beer and wine. Therefore it was then sought to deprive the physician altogether of the right, and he was and still is deprived of the right to prescribe beer. The limitation was placed on wine at 1 quart per 10 days.

Mr. President, I am willing to make the contention and I do not believe anybody can controvert the fact that those who were here at the time in both Houses know more about the intent and the meaning of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law than do those who were not actually participating in the debates at that time. Soon thereafter I offered an amendment to the Campbell-Willis law, which will be found in the same volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which I have referred a moment ago, at page 4741. Here is the amendment which was voted upon at that time:

That section 1 of title 2 of the national prohibition act is hereby amended by adding at the end of said section the following: "Provided, however, That the above construction of the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' so far as it relates to beer, ale, porter, and wine, shall not apply in those States which, through a referendum vote, shall adopt a different construction for the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor'; and any State may, through a referendum vote of the people, place such construction upon the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' as shall not include, within the operation of this act, beer, ale, and porter up to 5 per cent alcoholic content by volume, and wine up to 14 per cent; and the Federal Government hereby concurs in such construction, said referendum to be placed upon the ballot at any special election for that purpose called by the governor of any State, or of any State or national election whenever the governor of such State, in his discretion, may so direct, or whenever 15 per cent of the voters of such State shall so petition the secretary of state of such State at least 30 days before said election."

I wish to call the attention of Members of the Senate to the fact that my proposal then was for 5 per cent beer. I now wish to read into the RECORD a list of the Senators who voted for that amendment in 1921. I do not believe anyone will claim that those men were unpatriotic, that those men were trying to do something to evade a constitutional amendment which they themselves had participated in framing, or that they believed that the eighteenth amendment had anything to do at all with the one-half of 1 per cent which was sought afterwards as a limit.

Let me say further that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland legalizes beer at 2.75 per cent alcoholic content, and beer of that description was in existence, being sold and revenues being collected from it, at the time the act was passed.

But to come back to the amendment which was offered by me which proposed 5 per cent beer, I want to read the names of Senators who voted for that amendment at the time it was presented. They were:

Ball, Brandegee, Broussard, Cameron, Gerry, Johnson, King, La Follette—

That is the senior La Follette—

Lodge, McLean, Moses, Penrose, Phipps, Pomerene, Ransdell, Shortridge, Stanley, Wadsworth, Warren, and Weller.

There were 37 Senators who did not vote. It is within the knowledge of those who were present at that time that there were five or six other Senators who were in favor of the amendment and who would not have violated in any way what they considered an obligation under the oath which they took when they became Senators. I merely wanted to call attention to the facts I have stated in order to review briefly the history of this measure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, the Senator from Louisiana in 1920 offered an amendment to legalize 5 per cent beer, and the very Senators who had passed upon the eighteenth amendment, some of whom had voted for the eighteenth amendment, voted for the Senator's proposal of 5 per cent beer, feeling that in doing so there was not involved an infraction of the intent, the spirit, and the letter of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. My amendment, as compared with the amendment at that time submitted by the Senator from Louisiana, provides for very slightly more than half the alcoholic content of that provided in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Just about half. Not only that, Mr. President, but I do not know how those who framed the Volstead law as originally drawn, who were the same as those who voted to adopt the eighteenth amendment, could have overlooked what the Attorney General said, and should have included in the law something which the Attorney General said was never intended to be included, and why it was found necessary in 1921 to pass through both Houses of Congress, under whip and spur, the Willis-Campbell amendment to the Volstead law, which denied a physician altogether the right to prescribe beer and reduced his right to prescribe wine to 1 quart during 10 days. Up to that time I may say I have knowledge of the purchase of wine up to 5 gallons on doctors' prescriptions, sold by reputable drug stores and considered a legal transaction by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. President, I do not care to take very much more time. I am naturally opposed to the provisions of the Volstead law; I have been against its provisions and have advocated its modification all the time, and so it is not necessary for me to go into that phase of the subject.

I have discussed with a number of Members of the Senate, members of committees which would consider such proposals, the advisability of issuing $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds to afford relief to the unemployed in the country. I have opposed the issuance of $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds unless we could balance the Budget and find some means whereby we might raise the revenues necessary to retire such bond issues. I have thought, and I still believe, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, coupled with an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law, would afford all the relief that we need at this time.

It is my understanding that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has used very little, probably not over one-fourth, of the amount which it is authorized to loan; in other words, I do not believe it has sold any bonds. I do not think that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be permitted to go along as it has been doing and loan money to large corporations when so many private citizens need assistance. I think that the demands of the large corporations have practically been met up to this time, and I think if we set aside, earmarked, probably $1,000,000,000 of the amount allocated to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and specify for what purpose it shall be expended, and then if Congress shall adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, thereby adding one and a half billion dollars which may be expended on public works in the effort to afford unemployment relief, we would have all the funds necessary to take care of the present situation permanently and to restore confidence in the country. Certainly it would be sufficient to carry us over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. President, I am through. My purpose was merely to call attention to the fact that, as disclosed by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is not in violation of the eighteenth amendment, but is, in my opinion, in direct accord with it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate last night I made the statement that when the Volstead Act was adopted the Federal Government had already defined intoxicating liquor as liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol, and I said that a majority of the States had either adopted that definition or had defined intoxicating liquor as liquor containing a smaller content than one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator opposed to taxing beer?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; I am.

Mr. LONG. How about the amendment which is contained in the revenue bill which we are told will yield the Government $97,000,000 a year from taxing the beer makers? I refer to the amendment which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has sponsored.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is no taxation of beer in the pending bill.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Utah says that if it was not for the beer the people are making the amendment referred to would not yield anything.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not responsible for what the Senator from Utah says.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator think we ought to vote that kind of an amendment which taxes beer makers, knowing it is beer we are taxing when we are doing it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not assume that anybody is going to violate the law.

Mr. President, it so happens that Justice Brandeis in delivering the decision in the case of Jacob Ruppert against Caffey in October, 1919, about the time the Volstead Act was adopted, reviewed the matter of liquor definition as follows:

A test often used to determine whether a beverage is to be deemed intoxicating within the meaning of the liquor law is whether it contains one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. A survey of the liquor laws of the States reveals that in 17 States the test is either a list of enumerated beverages, without regard to whether they contain any alcohol or the presence of any alcohol in a beverage, regardless of quantity; in 18 States it is the presence of as much as or more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

At that time, Mr. President, the prohibitory law of the State of Alabama prohibited in terms all liquors containing any alcohol.

The liquor laws of the State of Arizona prohibited ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquor or liquors of whatever kind.

The liquor laws of Arkansas prohibited any alcoholic, vinous, malt, spirituous, or fermented liquors.

The liquor laws of the State of Colorado prohibited intoxicating liquors, no matter how small the percentage of alcohol they might contain.

In the State of Iowa the liquor law prohibited any intoxicating liquor, "which term shall be construed to mean alcohol, ale, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous, and malt liquor, and all intoxicating liquor whatever." The courts of Iowa held that liquors containing any alcohol whatever were prohibited under that law.

The liquor laws of the State of Kansas prohibited any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors. The highest court of that State held that the mere presence of the liquors mentioned made the substance intoxicating for purposes of the prohibition statutes.

The liquor laws of the State of Maryland prohibited any spirituous, vinous, fermented, malt, or intoxicating liquors or any mixture thereof containing alcohol for beverage purposes.

The Maryland liquor laws of 1916 prohibited in a certain county any kindred preparation of beverage having the appearance and taste of lager beer, except those beverages that were labeled to the effect that the beverage was free of alcohol.

The liquor laws of the State of Michigan prohibited intoxicating liquors, including any vinous, malt, brewed, fermented, or spirituous liquors, and all liquids containing any alcohol capable of being used as a beverage.

The liquor laws of the State of Mississippi prohibited spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind.

The liquor laws of the State of New Mexico prohibited ardent spirits, ale, beer, alcohol, wine, or liquor of any kind whatsoever containing alcohol.

The laws of the State of New York defined intoxicating liquor as "all distilled or rectified spirits, wine, fermented and malt liquors."

The laws of Ohio prohibited liquor or intoxicating liquors, including distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, or alcoholic liquor, and also any alcoholic liquid capable of being used as a beverage.

The laws of South Dakota prohibited intoxicating liquors and stated that intoxicating liquors included whisky, alcohol, brandy, gin, rum, wine, ale, beer, absinthe, cordials, hard or fermented cider, and all distilled spirituous, vinous, malt, brewed, and fermented liquors, and every other liquid containing alcohol capable of being used as a beverage.

The liquor laws of the State of Washington were to the effect that intoxicating liquors included whisky, brandy, rum, wine, ale, beer, or any spirituous, vinous, fermented, malt, or any other liquor containing intoxicating properties. A later law in 1915 defined intoxicating liquors as including whisky and all liquids containing any alcohol capable of being used as a beverage.

The laws of the State of Connecticut defined intoxicating liquor as "all beer manufactured from hops and malt or from hops and barley, and all beer on the receptacle containing which the laws of the United States require a revenue stamp to be affixed, but shall not include beverages which contain no alcohol." Any trace of alcohol made liquor an intoxicating liquor in the State of Connecticut at the time the Volstead Act was adopted.

The laws of the State of Delaware defined intoxicating liquor as all liquid mixtures containing so much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Florida defined intoxicating liquor as all beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, or more, by volume.

The laws of the State of Georgia defined "prohibited liquors" as beer, near beer, and beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, or more, by volume.

The laws of the State of Illinois define a dramshop as a place where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are retailed, and intoxicating liquors were deemed to include all such liquors.

The Illinois law of 1919 defined intoxicating liquors as including—all distilled, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors which contain more than one-half of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol.

In Indiana the liquor laws described intoxicating liquor as meaning—all malt, vinous, or spirituous liquor containing so much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Maine prohibited—any beverage containing a percentage of alcohol which by Federal enactment or by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States * * * renders a beverage intoxicating.

Again, the laws of the State of Maryland of 1917 were to the effect that—

Malt liquors shall be construed to embrace porter, ale, beer, and all malt or brewed drinks * * * containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; and that the words "intoxicating liquors" * * * shall * * * embrace both spirituous liquors and malt liquors and * * * all liquid mixtures * * * containing so much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The prohibitory law of the State of Minnesota had defined intoxicating liquor as including—ethyl alcohol and any kind of distilled, fermented, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor or liquid of any kind potable as a beverage, whenever any of said liquors or liquids contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Missouri provided that—

The phrase "intoxicating liquor," * * * whenever used in this act shall be construed to mean and include any distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or alcoholic liquors, all alcoholic liquids * * * which contain one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Nebraska defined intoxicating liquor as liquors—capable of use as a beverage containing over one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The prohibitory laws in Nevada defined intoxicating liquor as—all beverages containing so much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Oklahoma defined intoxicating liquors as those containing—as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Tennessee defined intoxicating liquor as—liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

The laws of the State of Utah defined intoxicating liquor as—all beverages containing in excess of one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of Virginia described ardent spirits as embracing—alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, wine, porter, ale, beer, all malt liquors, absinthe, and all compounds * * *; and all beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of West Virginia described intoxicating liquors as embracing—all malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, beer, or any other intoxicating drink * * *; and all malt or brewed drinks, whether intoxicating or not, shall be deemed malt liquors * * * and all beverages containing so much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The laws of the State of New Hampshire described intoxicating liquors as those—containing more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

I mention these definitions in existence when the Volstead Act was passed to show that the standard of one-half of 1 per cent or more was by no means any new thing in the matter of defining intoxicating liquor, and that even a lower standard was by no means a new thing. There was ample precedent, therefore, for the clause in the Volstead Act defining intoxicating liquor as liquor containing a half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol. In fact, a strict construction of that clause might well support the view that the named liquors, such as whisky, beer, ale, or wine, are regarded by the Volstead Act as intoxicating, however small the alcoholic content.

Mr. President, I have only a few further comments to make.

In the days before prohibition, almost all intoxicating liquor was sold in saloons. Beer comprised 90 per cent of that saloon liquor—beer ranging in alcoholic content from 1 to 7 per cent, the average being 3.8 per cent. The Tydings proposal to legalize the sale of beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent is an effort to bring back the old-time saloon beer in one of its recognized and substantial forms. This saloon beer was one of the most offensive, dangerous, and general forms of intoxicating drink abolished by the Constitution of the United States when the eighteenth amendment was adopted.

The Tydings amendment is an effort to nullify the Constitution by a statutory enactment—to destroy by statute what has been solemnly decreed by the Constitution itself. Every legislator who votes for it, in my judgment, violates his oath to support the American Constitution. I do not mean that any Senator would knowingly vote to violate the Constitution, but, in my judgment, that is the effect of his vote on this measure to-day. The adoption of the Tydings amendment would mean the destruction of prohibition.

Prohibition is in the Constitution; and it can be fairly and properly removed only by an amendment to the Constitution itself, not by a congressional statute.

The Tydings proposal would make beer the lawful form of alcoholic drink in the United States. In 1914, the last year before prohibitory and tax restrictions began seriously to be felt, the capital investment in lawful alcoholic drink amounted to $915,000,000. The consumption thereof amounted to 2,252,272,000 gallons per year. Expenditure by the masses therefor amounted to $1,743,577,000.

Beer ranging in alcoholic content from 1 to 7 per cent represented 90 per cent of that capital investment, of that consumption, and more than half of that expenditure.

We had in 1914 a population of 97,000,000 people, in round numbers, in continental United States. To-day we have a population of 124,000,000, an increase of more than 25 per cent.

It will be seen, therefore, how conservative is the statement that with one of the principal forms of alcoholic drink restored in 1932, capital invested, consumption, and expenditure for consumption would at least equal what these items were for all forms of such drink 18 years ago, when we had a population smaller by 25 per cent than the present population, especially when we recall that the restored form represented 90 per cent of capital investment and consumption in 1914, and more than half of the expenditure for consumption.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to read a very short letter of six lines that I have just received, among others, from the Department of Chemistry, of the University of California, in Berkeley, which is, of course, a very justly celebrated State:

> MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: Alcoholic intoxication depends not only upon the alcoholic content of the beverage, but also upon the quantity consumed, the rate of consumption, and the individual. I believe that 5 per cent beer, consumed at the rate of three bottles per hour, is nonintoxicating.
> Sincerely yours,
> WENDELL M. LATIMER,
> Professor of Chemistry.

I can duplicate that letter at any time from the scientists and members of the medical profession of the country. That is 5 per cent beer.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is like a number of other statements the Senator has read in the Senate from time to time. The person making the statement does not say whether he is speaking of intoxication as meaning visible drunkenness or visible intoxication. As a matter of fact, a trace of alcohol produces a certain amount of poison in the delicate tissues of the body, especially the brain, and the deadly work of intoxication in the technical sense of poison begins at that time; and few, if any, of the authorities cited by the Senator contradict that proposition.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am listening with great interest to the observations of the Senator. I note that he has read from the statutes of different States enacted at different times.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So I have. They are quoted in footnotes to the deciding opinion by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Ruppert v. Caffey (251 U. S. 264).

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely. I inquire in order that we may understand more definitely:

I note that in some instances reference is made to the percentage by weight, and in other instances to the percentage by volume. Will the Senator be good enough to make the difference clear? In looking over the RECORD of yesterday, in a colloquy that passed between two Senators, I find that it is said that 2.75 per cent beer by weight is equal to 3.1 per cent by volume. May we agree upon that?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I can express, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from California asked me the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator was engaged. Would the Senator mind if I should define the difference?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to have the honor of answering the question addressed to me. I say that with all due respect to my good friend the Senator from Maryland, for whom I have as complete an admiration, as he knows, as I have for any other Member of the Senate. It is my chief regret that a man in the very morning of his career, with every hope and promise of continuous and increasing success, should identify himself with a body of death like alcoholic liquor.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should like the answer to my question to come from the Senator from Texas. I am merely seeking information; I am not asking in any controversial sense.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A percentage by weight means a percentage of beer per ounce, or some other weight unit, and a percentage by volume means a percentage per pint, or half-pint, or some other liquid measure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is the relation about as stated in the RECORD—namely, that 2.75 per cent beer by weight is substantially the same as 3.1 per cent by volume?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think we can clear up that point by laying down the proposition that a beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by volume has less alcohol than a beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight. The illustration the Senator from California just referred to is accurate; namely, that a beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is actually a beer of about 3.1 per cent of alcohol by volume. The difference, therefore, is somewhere in the neighborhood of 1 per cent. A beer having a certain alcoholic content by volume has 20 per cent less alcohol than a beer having the same content of alcohol by weight.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I expect, of course, to vote against the Tydings amendment; therefore my question can not be misunderstood by the Senator from Texas. Getting back to his statement, however, that any Senator who should vote for the Tydings amendment would be violating his oath of office, suppose the Supreme Court should decide that the Tydings amendment was not in violation of the Constitution; would the Senator from Texas think that the members of the Supreme Court were violating their oaths of office?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think that in such instance the court would be holding something that was not true in fact. The decision, however, would establish the meaning of the Constitution itself, would create the constitutional standard, and could not be said to violate the Constitution. I would not say that a Senator would be violating his oath of office if he followed a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States establishing what the Constitution is.

Mr. GLASS. Has not a Senator as much liberty to form his own judgment upon a question of that sort as the Supreme Court has?

Mr. SHEPPARD. So he does.

Mr. GLASS. I do not exactly see how the Senator can reach the conclusion, except in his opinion alone, that a Senator who votes for a certain alcoholic content as making a beverage intoxicating thereby violates his oath of office.

Mr. SHEPPARD. All I said was that such was my opinion. I would not think of charging that any Senator would intentionally vote to violate the Constitution.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. According to the philosophy which has been so ably presented by the Senator from Texas, does he not think that we should prohibit any alcoholic content at all, for certainly if 1 per cent or three-fourths of 1 per cent immediately sets up this poisoning process within the body of a man, why should we not eliminate it entirely? Why let this fraction of one-half of 1 per cent start its nefarious work when we have the power to wipe it all out?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That point has never been decided, so far as the Volstead Act is concerned. It is my judgment that the definition of intoxicating liquor in the Volstead Act applies to liquors with any tangible trace of alcohol—that is, where such liquors are specifically named in the act.

Mr. TYDINGS. I respect the Senator's view, and I take it that he feels that even a content of one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol means a violation of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Volstead Act itself says in effect that any liquid we know as beer, wine, whisky, ale, or porter is forbidden, regardless of alcoholic content, and applies the one-half of 1 per cent limitation to other liquids, such as certain soft drinks or other drinks which might be found to have a trace of alcohol in them but which trace would be neutralized by certain ingredients in the other liquids.

One sentence more, Mr. President, and I shall have concluded. Even on the conservative basis I have mentioned, the basis of the figures of 1914, the capital investment, the consumption, and the expenditures for consumption of 1914, the Tydings proposal would tax the American people in the neighborhood of more than a billion dollars for beer and the capital resources of the country eight or nine hundred million dollars for brewery equipment and construction in order to secure $350,000,000 a year for revenue. That is too dear a price to pay for the revenue in contemplation.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I can not agree with the statement that a content of more than one-half of 1 per cent would constitute a violation of the constitutional inhibition. One-half of 1 per cent was placed in the Volstead Act to draw a distinction between a beverage called malt extract and beverages of a similar character, which were sold for food and for medicinal purposes. The limitation of one-half of 1 per cent was in the revenue law prior to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, and prior to the enactment of the Volstead Act, and was retained because departments of the Government were familiar with that limitation. That is how that fiction came into existence.

We are all familiar with the fact that during the year which followed the war, for the conservation of food and for other purposes, beer was permitted to be made with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent. We are also familiar with the fact that prior to that time beer made in the United States had had a very high content, 3½, 4½, and 5 per cent. In fact, all the beers made in America were of a much higher alcoholic content than those made in Europe. None of the beers in England or in Germany go much higher than 3 per cent.

If the Congress of the United States, in exercising its judgment, fixes one-half of 1 per cent as the point of intoxication, and that exercise of judgment is sustained by the Supreme Court, certainly, if the Congress should change its definition and change its opinion, and do it within reasonable limits, the Supreme Court would sustain the opinion of the Congress.

The 2.75 per cent, as well as the one-half of 1 per cent, was a measurement which was accepted during the war. Of course I agree that if the Congress should fix a limitation so high that it would be absurd, so high that the beer would clearly be intoxicating, and that there would be no question about it, the Supreme Court would check the opinion of the Congress. But if Congress exercises its judgment in a reasonable and proper way, and follows the decisions of physicians and doctors and scientists, and does not engage in a high and arbitrary limitation, there is no doubt in my mind but that the Supreme Court would sustain the opinion of the Congress. So that this matter does not involve a violation of the Constitution.

The amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has in it various elements which commend it to my approval. First, there is the situation of lawlessness all through the United States brought about, I believe, by this intemperate limitation in the Volstead Act. That is one of the things the adoption of this amendment would help. It would not only help in the matter of stopping the sale of bootlegger beer, it would not only put into the coffers of our Treasury money derived from the sale of beer, but it would stop the diversion of large sums of money to this illegal business.

There is the other element, of unemployment, for which no practical remedy has yet been proposed; the third element of continuing works of a public character. So the amendment is properly brought before the Senate in this revenue bill.

All of us hear complaints about different forms of taxes, taxes on manufactures, taxes on products of all kinds, and general complaint is made against the levying of these taxes. But this amendment would produce a revenue which would be voluntarily assumed by any man who bought a glass of beer. He could evade the payment of the tax if he so desired, or pay them if he so decided. It is my opinion that the revenue would come quickly; it would come cheerfully; it would be, in many of our States, a most agreeable way of paying part of the cost of government.

The Senator from Texas discussed various State statutes, all of which have been approved by the Supreme Court. He might have added one more, for the State of Alabama passed a statute providing that anything that tasted like beer or looked like beer or smelled like beer was prohibited in that State. That decision was upheld by the Supreme Court. So the law has been very carefully defined as giving to each State the power to decide what it wants done in this particular matter.

A majority of the States of the Union to-day have State statutes prohibiting the sale of beer, so if this amendment should be agreed to they would be protected against even 2.75 per cent or any form of beer, or, as in one State to which I have called attention, the sale of anything that looks or smells or tastes like beer. It would afford no embarrassment to any State which did not permit the sale of this beer, but it would restore to those States which want to grant the right to sell beer the power to do so.

Our penitentiaries are full to overflowing with prisoners. We are now building additions to the Federal penitentiaries. The question of how to take care of the increasing number of prisoners is pressing all the time.

I am under the impression that this amendment will help in the matter of law enforcement. It will help in the matter of revenue. It will help in the matter of employment. It is definite. It is certain. There is no other measure now before the Congress which proposes a plan and a method of financing a plan as does this amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, so much has been said about drinking since prohibition, demoralized conditions, and so forth, that I desire to submit some testimony along that line.

I desire to present to the Senate a letter from Dr. Charles E. Barker, of Grand Rapids, Mich., who has been speaking in the schools of the United States for 18 years. Knowing that this work had given him an exceptional opportunity to note conditions in our schools and elsewhere, I asked him for a statement as to the effect of prohibition from the standpoint of his own personal observation. Doctor Barker is one of the ablest and most interesting speakers and one of the keenest observers in the United States. His reply was as follows:

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: I have just returned home from my lecture trip in the East and hasten to answer your letter of January 30.

As you suggest in your letter, I suppose that my testimony in regard to the effects of prohibition upon the youth of our country might have some weight in view of the fact that for the past 18 years I have spent 8 months of the year speaking almost every day before the students of our high schools and colleges, and this work takes me each year into nearly every State of the country.

In a few high schools in some of our large cities, located in what might be termed "wealthy residential sections," the principals have told me that they have had more or less trouble with some of their students drinking at their school functions. With these few exceptions, however, the testimony of practically all other principals is universally the same, viz, that drinking among their pupils is practically nil, and that the eighteenth amendment has proven of immense benefit to the youth of the country. In this connection may I call your attention to the action of some 3,000 school superintendents in Detroit last year, when a resolution was offered by a New Jersey superintendent calling for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Only 2 delegates supported the resolution, and the balance—some 2,800—voted against it.

Before the passage of the eighteenth amendment it was the common, everyday affair to see people intoxicated, either on the streets, in hotels, or on trains. Since I left my home last October I have been in over 20 States, and during this time I have not seen but four or five persons intoxicated, or, using the more common expression, drunk.

Very sincerely yours,

CHAS. E. BARKER.

Let me refer at this point to the subject of drinking among newspapermen.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject to which he was just referring, may I interrupt him?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was very much interested in listening to the opinion of the lecturer who had gone all around the country. I was just wondering how his opinion could be held when here in the city of Washington the police records show that five times as many persons under 21 years of age have been arrested each year for drunkenness as during the period prior to the adoption of national prohibition

Mr. SHEPPARD. An increase in arrests does not necessarily mean an increase in drunkenness.

Now to get back to the newspapermen. I present a statement by Mr. O. O. McIntyre, a noted commentator on current affairs, made in New York on March 9 last. It is as follows:

The hard-drinking reporter has been beglamoured by fiction, the stage, and screen—a reputed symbol of a sentimentality toward drinking in the newspaper shops. A standard dose from this pharmacopœia of romance is that the drunken writer turns out the most brilliant copy while in his cups.

With rare exceptions this has never been true. Henry L. Mencken, a robust defender of wassail, recently admitted: "As a city editor my views of the traditional drinking genius soon changed. I was to discover that the best copy was turned out by sober men."

In my somewhat varied and migratory experiences in print shops I do not recall a single boozer who beat boozing. Some rose to momentary pinnacles, but dropped like plummets. Final chapters were a record of suicides, strait-jackets in psychopathic wards, and wooden crosses in potter's fields."

While there are still irrationalisms from drinking in editorial rooms, they have been generally ironed out. Newspaper publishers have learned no matter how brilliant the reporter, he is a dangerous experiment in emergencies if drinking.

I know drinking members of the guild fairly well, having years ago been one of them. Many of the ink-stained sots were unpurchasable, but were also unreliable. And unless they cut away from drinking they rarely amounted to much at the finish line. Their fervor was false.

Reporters graduating to high editorial posts, to playwrighting, or authoring best-selling novels may have had flings, but they tapered off before they went to responsible posts. I can count 11 whose inebriety brought professional oblivion.

Twenty years ago the sober reporter was in the minority on staffs of newspapers. On one paper in the middle West was only one teetotaler and he was regarded a trifle effeminate. To-day the picture is reversed. I do not know a single forthright reporter who is a souse.

Mr. President, returning to the subject of drinking among young people, I want to read a quotation from the Practitioner, a medical journal of London, England, in reference to conditions in antiprohibition England.

The most unwelcome sign of the time is the great increase in alcoholic abuse among undergraduates * * * who demonstrate their disregard for college rules and common decency in appearing disgracefully intoxicated in public.

I desire to give another quotation from an English authority in reference to drinking by the young people of wet England, Dr. J. Risien Russell, who, speaking before the Institute of Hygiene in London, said:

Girls not out of school are to be seen drinking cocktails, champagne, and liquors. * * * It has become a serious national question that young women should be living on excitement and keeping themselves going by drugs and alcohol.

If we did not know that this comment referred to another country, we would think this was a characteristic wet speech in the United States.

Judge D. S. McKinlay, of Chicago, quotes an English writer as saying:

The drink habit is steadily displacing the voluntary teetotalism that every girl was formerly wont to observe, and young people are indulging in fiery illicit whisky.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Do the statements last quoted apply to conditions in England or in the United States?

Mr. SHEPPARD. In wet England. I am glad the Senator emphasizes that point.

Among the welfare workers of this country, Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago; Commander Evangeline Booth, of the Salvation Army; Dr. Elliot, of Hudson Guild, on the west side of Manhattan; and Miss Lillian D. Wald, of the Henry Street Settlement, on the east side of Manhattan, all tell us that conditions are substantially better among the people with whom they work than before prohibition. The National Teachers' Association, composed of 220,000 teachers, and the National Parent-Teachers Association tell us that prohibition is a success.

Col. George H. Davis, of the Salvation Army, Chicago, had the following to say recently:

Among more than a million poor and unemployed with whom we have come in direct contact in the past 16 months, in the Chicago district alone, we find that under prohibition the evidence of drink as a factor has been reduced almost to the vanishing point. * * * Information from our women's homes shows that compared with the large number who once came to our doors begging admittance because of their having been ruined through strong drink the number that now comes from this cause is less than 1 per cent. In fact, it is practically nil.

Miss Lillian D. Wald, of the Henry Street Settlement, on the east side of Manhattan, recently said:

I have no hesitation whatsoever in asserting that prohibition, despite its weakness, has worked untold good to the greater portion of our population, and that to repeal or modify the amendment would be a grave mistake—one that might be fraught with serious social and economic consequences. * * *

Nothing can ever equal the brazen way in which the saloons flaunted their power throughout the years of their privilege, of their farcical evasion of the numerous efforts to regulate and control them by legislative enactment and by moral pressure. On Saturday nights their influence was most obvious and most sinister. The trucks gathered around the curb while the men went inside with their pay envelopes.

That scene has disappeared from one end of the country to the other, and with it have gone the Sunday brawls, the tragic Monday mornings when in factory and workshop tearful women came to beg for advances on their husbands' wages because Mike or Jim or Tony had left the contents of his pay envelope at the corner saloon. * * *

The one ray of light in the gloom is that no longer do we see the hideous alcoholic wrecks—the "old soaks"—who a few years ago patronized the bread lines. The majority of unemployed men along the Bowery and at the municipal lodging houses to-day give no token that it is drink that has brought them to the waiting line. An even more significant change is reflected by the statistics of the family welfare organizations.

I submit these citations to show that the statements by defenders of the Tydings amendment in reference to alleged conditions in the United States since the advent of prohibition are without foundation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the Senate is ready to vote, and I shall consume only about three minutes in a very brief statement.

Succeeding the vote on this proposition we shall immediately vote on whether or not we shall tax wort. Wort is nothing more nor less than barley with water which has been boiled. In this form it is unfermented beer. All one need do to make beer from wort is to put water in it and beer is the immediate result. So I imagine, while the amendment which is now pending may not be successful, we shall immediately show our great courage, our great honesty, our great love for the Constitution, our unswerving sense of righteousness, our candor, and our consistency by voting a tax on wort, which is used to make beer. The Senate will probably vote against a harmless and not unconstitutional amendment which would tax 2.75 per cent beer; but, because under the disguise of this so-called thing called wort, all of us can vote overwhelmingly for a tax on it without the slightest twinge of conscience of dragging the Constitution through the mire of lawlessness.

I want to say just a word in conclusion. Between five and ten million people with their dependents are out of employment. This measure is sound; it is honest; it does not transgress the eighteenth amendment. If adopted, it would provide a means of liquidating a bond issue and leave $300,000,000 over each year for general Treasury purposes. The issue is, Shall we relieve the taxpayer of another burden, provide for unemployment, and help to recover our lost prosperity, or shall we keep on with this senseless definition of one-half of 1 per cent alcoholic content for beer, which no scientist of note in the country claims to be the line of demarkation between a nonintoxicating and an intoxicating beverage.

Mr. President, I feel it would be futile to consume more time. I realize the situation is not yet grave enough to force us to vote as we shall perhaps vote within a year in this very body. I therefore, Mr. President, ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is desirous of speaking briefly on the pending amendment. He is not in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] desires to proceed.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator from Rhode Island the floor?

Mr. METCALF. I should like to proceed for about five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I appreciate the attitude of those good people who still believe that the prohibition law is bringing temperance; I realize the sincerity of their efforts in trying to bring about a Utopia which they would like to see attained; but the awful conditions that the prohibition law has brought upon this country makes every thinking man realize what a great mistake was the enactment of this law. To-day we live in probably the most criminal country in the world. Have you, Mr. President, or I ever seen such racketeering and kidnaping as are now going on in our beloved country? I hope, yes, I pray, that the time has come when we shall bring about a change in this devastating law that has worked such havoc to our people.

Mr. President, many years ago, when I was young, whoever thought the time would come when young men and young women in this country would go to parties with flasks of hard liquor on their hips? Whoever thought they would go to parties and dance at respectable houses and drink cocktails and hard liquor? Ah, Mr. President, times have changed since you and I were young.

Mr. President, I would vote to retain the prohibition law on the statute books were I assured that it would bring temperance and morality to our country; but what has been the result? Our prisons are full; more appropriations are asked to build more prisons; criminals lurk on almost every street corner; graft is present in many of the prohibition offices. I believe that by passing some measure which would legalize the sale of light wine and beer, such a measure as the one the Senator from Maryland has proposed, we would go a long way in stopping the wicked trade that is now being carried on.

It is not affecting the rich any more than it is the poor. I spoke the other day to a man who has worked in the factory where I once worked for many years. I asked him, "Is liquor just as plentiful as ever?" He replied, "Yes." I asked him, "Do the young people drink it?" He said, "Oh, yes; but if we could only have some decent beer instead of this horrible stuff which they drink, there would not be the drunkenness and the crime and immorality that are now prevalent."

Mr. President, I read this morning a short article from the Baltimore Sun, entitled "Let Bingham Bing." I should like to read the article at this point.

LET BINGHAM BING

Things being as they are, there is little chance that Senator BINGHAM will be able to do anything with his proposal for a tax on beer at this session of Congress. The thing is too intelligent, too direct, too easily understood by the ordinary citizen to make much impression on a Congress still in mortal terror of the Anti-Saloon League.

But although the Senator may not get his tax on beer, that is not to say that he is not doing a real service to the taxpaying John Smith. For John, when he begins to pay the nuisance taxes which the Senate bill imposes on him, will understand very clearly, thanks to Senator BINGHAM, exactly how he is being mulcted.

Every time John pays 3 cents for a 2-cent stamp he will know it is because Congress was afraid to put a tax on beer. Every time he pays 55 cents for a 50-cent movie ticket he will remember that it is because Congress was afraid to put a tax on beer. Every time he pays a tax on his telephone, his occasional telegraph message, his radio, his automobile, his lubricating oil, he will know that it was because Congress was afraid to put a tax on beer.

And every time he pays a 4 per cent income tax for a 2 per cent Government he will know, thanks to BINGHAM, that it is because he has a Congress which follows the sort of people who insist it is a crime the equal of manslaughter to sell a workingman a cold bottle of beer on a hot summer night.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter which I have just received in which the writer claims that if a proper tax were put upon a barrel of beer the National Government would receive $1,213,299,360 a year revenue.

I certainly believe that the time has come to change this iniquitous law. I am reminded of a little poem which, it is said, was written by an English divine:

O God Almighty, Lord divine,
Who once turned water into wine;
Forgive the wicked acts of men,
Who try to turn it back again.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to clear up my own mind, if possible, on two or three points with reference to this amendment. Therefore, I request the attention of the Senator from Maryland to two or three questions I should like to ask him.

In the first place, I think there is some misunderstanding as to which is the higher alcoholic content in certain figures, whether by volume or by specific gravity, known as weight.

As I understand it, 2.75 per cent alcoholic content by volume has less alcohol than 2.75 alcoholic content by weight. Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. WALCOTT. The second question:

It has been claimed by several opponents of this measure that it in some way breaks one's oath of office to vote for this amendment. I should like to ask this question:

Does the amendment in any sense abrogate or set aside the authority vested in the Supreme Court by defying that court and prejudging the matter, leaving the authority with Congress to say whether this 2.75 beer is or is not intoxicating in fact?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question, and I should like to answer it by pointing out briefly three different phases of the answer.

First of all, the eighteenth amendment prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors. It uses specifically the word "liquors." The court never has passed upon the fact as to whether or not the word "liquors" embraces beer or wine. In the old revenue cases, when one tax was levied on beer and another on wine, and another on liquor, the Supreme Court did draw the distinction between liquors, beers, and wines. So we have that fact.

The second fact is that in a case which went up to the Supreme Court from Baltimore City, where the indictment set forth a percentage of alcohol and a demurrer was filed against the indictment, the court held that the beverage was not a violation of the law unless it was intoxicating in fact.

Third. The Supreme Court has never said what the mark is which divides nonintoxicating from intoxicating beverages; and in previous opinions it has been indirectly, if not directly, stated that Congress could use its discretion to define an alcoholic beverage, so long as it did not transgress the field of the eighteenth amendment.

Fourth. By eminent testimony adduced from such sources as the professors of medicine and chemistry at the Universities of Pennsylvania, California, Yale, and other places which I quoted last night the overwhelming testimony—in fact all, without an exception—was that a beverage containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by volume was not an intoxicating liquor, and therefore did not conflict with the eighteenth amendment.

Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. WALCOTT. Yes.

My third question is this: Referring to the financial side of this amendment, the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland sets up a certain schedule of allocations. It allocates by large amounts the proceeds of a bond issue, up to a billion and a half dollars, to certain departments of the Government. Am I correct in assuming that those allotments have been made according to a preconceived plan authorized by the Congress and in conjunction with the Director of the Budget?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator that a short while ago Congress passed an act creating what was called the Stabilization Board, which was then set up and is in existence to-day. That board has gone through all the acts of Congress in reference to authorizations for public improvements, and has made a report which the Senator from New York has put in the RECORD at some place. I can not just recall where it is; but, at any rate, the allocation made is made in accordance with the authorizations heretofore made by Congress.

For example, if the amendment says that $252,000,000 shall be allocated to the Department of Agriculture, that means that heretofore acts have passed both branches of Congress and been signed by the President authorizing construction projects to that extent, but for which no appropriation has been made.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. WALCOTT. Yes.

My last question is this: With these large sums allocated, is it the intent of this amendment not to spend these large amounts, thereby increasing the deficit, until or unless the revenues from the tax on beer have become available?

Mr. TYDINGS. I can answer that question, of course, only by comparison.

In the years 1917 and 1918 Congress fixed the alcoholic content of beer at 2.75 per cent by volume, the same as this amendment does. That was under war-time prohibition; and 55,000,000 barrels were sold that year, as against 60,000,000 barrels, the normal consumption in years when the alcoholic content was higher than 2.75 per cent. So that notwithstanding the reduced alcoholic content practically as much of this kind of beer was consumed in 1918 as was consumed in the years when the alcoholic content was higher.

I think that is a factual illustration which augurs well for the fact that practically as much of this beer would be consumed to-day, with an increase in population, as was consumed 14 years ago.

More than that, it would only require 40 per cent of the normal consumption of beer to raise enough money to provide for the sinking fund and the interest annually. So that if we consumed now only half as much beer as we did in 1918, sufficient money would come into the Treasury to pay the sinking-fund requirements, to pay the interest, and leave a substantial sum over for other purposes.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. WALCOTT. It does.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want just a minute to put in the RECORD an explanation of my vote on this amendment.

I shall vote for this amendment as a matter of enforcing the prohibition law of this country. I think this amendment, giving this country 2.75 per cent beer, is an enforcement agency to prohibition. We know now, despite the remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] that experience has shown us that we are not enforcing the prohibition law as it is. I sincerely believe that a legitimate 2.75 per cent beer will enable us really to have some measure of prohibition enforcement in the United States.

Second. I have discussed this matter with the leading lawyers of the Senate, many of whom are not voting as I am voting, who believe that we are within the Constitution in allowing 2.75 per cent beer. Congress manifestly can not give an interpretation to intoxicating liquor that is unreasonable, but it certainly can give a reasonable interpretation. Even though it might miss it by a point or two either way, too little or too much, as it did in the case of one-half of 1 per cent, unless it is clearly an unreasonable interpretation it would be sustained by the Supreme Court.

Third. The revenue that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] mentioned as now being spent for intoxicating liquor is being spent anyway. The people are spending more money to-day for intoxicants in this country than would be spent on any 2.75 beer.

Fourth. If we are ever going to have any enforcement of prohibition, we people who have supported prohibition—and I yield to no man in the support which I have given to prohibition in such short political lifetime as I have had—but if we are going to have prohibition enforcement in the United States we are going to have to meet the facts as they are. If we want to see prohibition we are going to have to be reasonable in our interpretations of what is an intoxicant, because certainly we have tried with the present interpretation without very good success.

Fifth. This will give revenue that is now going into illegitimate traffic. It will give revenue that is being absorbed by the gangsters, and thereby make it possible, with a reasonable interpretation, for the people of this country not to make themselves law violators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not consume any time in discussing the portion of this amendment which provides for a modification of the Volstead Act. I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] wishes to close the debate, which seems reasonable; and, there being so little time, I shall not take any more than necessary to explain my reasons for supporting the portion of the amendment which relates to the acceleration of Federal public works.

I merely wish to state that in my judgment the program embodied in this amendment is totally inadequate if the objective which Congress seeks to achieve is a stimulation of business activity in the United States. As one of those who have subscribed, since the beginning of this cataclysmic depression, to the application of the public-works theory as a means of checking the downward spiral of deflation and turning it in the opposite direction, I am convinced as a result of the study I have made of this question for the past 18 months that $1,500,000,000 of public works, particularly of the type provided for in this amendment, will not achieve a reversal of the deflation spiral. I believe I can demonstrate that by referring to some of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor on the five and a half billion dollar public-works program which I introduced at the beginning of this session.

The testimony seems to indicate without serious question that the curtailment of the public-works activities of the municipalities, counties, and States this year, 1932, as compared with 1931, will amount to in excess of $1,500,000,000. This has been brought about more largely by the pressure of the banks upon the municipalities. They have insisted upon the curtailment by municipalities of their normal construction programs; and in order to secure the necessary financing or refinancing from the banks, the municipalities have been forced to curtail most drastically their public-works programs as compared even with 1931.

I shall support this amendment, however, not because I regard it as an adequate program with which to meet the existing emergency, but because I believe it is a step in the right direction, and because I believe, once committed to the theory of employing public works as a means of stemming the disastrous tide of this deflation, that the Congress will be forced by the logic of the situation to go forward and adopt additional provisions for the expansion of public works until it has authorized a program commensurate to deal with this catastrophic problem that confronts us.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

On page 4, in lines 14, 21, and 24, I move to substitute "4" for "2.75."

Mr. President, the effect of this amendment is to substitute for the beer which is provided for in this amendment, 2.75 per cent alcohol by volume, beer which is 4 per cent alcohol by volume. The reason for this is that in the hearings which were held very extensively by the Committee on Manufactures, relating to this general subject, there was abundant testimony, from physiologists of world-wide distinction, from physicians, and others, that 4 per cent beer could be manufactured and sold without contravening the Constitution.

The first point that was raised in those hearings was whether 4 per cent beer was intoxicating in fact. A witness was brought before the committee by the so-called "wet" forces who was originally scheduled to appear at the request of the so-called "dry" forces, because he was a research professor who had been connected with the Carnegie Institute, and had some years ago made an investigation in connection with the effect of alcohol on the human system.

In the course of his testimony, although he stated that a small amount of alcohol would produce certain slight reactions in the eye and certain slight reactions in the hands, the amount contained in 4 per cent beer, consumed in such quantities as could be taken by the ordinary person, would not produce intoxication in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution.

The committee made an effort to discover what the line might be whereby a fermented beverage—cider, for instance—could be manufactured under the Constitution. Distinguished scientists of national and international reputation testified that in Germany, the country where beer is most commonly used, there were persons—for instance, bakers—in the city of Munich who drank Munich beer, which is of an alcoholic content greater than 4 per cent, who on the average consumed 10 quarts each day without producing intoxication, but that on account of the large volume of water which they drank, it did produce what was known as a beer heart. I know that it is amusing to the average person to know that one can drink too much water.

As a matter of fact, many of the physiologists insisted that 4 per cent beer was not intoxicating in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution.

The statement was made on the floor yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the author of the eighteenth amendment, that there was no question but that Congress had done wisely in declaring that one-half of 1 per cent alcohol was intoxicating. Everybody knows that good buttermilk contains one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. [Laughter.] Merely because the Congress stated that one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol in a beverage is intoxicating does not make buttermilk intoxicating. Merely because the Congress adopted a regulation of the Treasury Department, which was not designed to determine the intoxicating nature of a beverage, but merely to draw a line at which taxes could be levied; merely because the Congress stated that that line defined the region of intoxication and nonintoxication, is no reason why we should continue that ridiculous statement in our prohibition laws, which has done more than any other one thing to bring discredit upon those laws.

There is no one in the United States who can state without a smile that ginger ale containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, as old-fashioned ginger ale did contain, is intoxicating. There is no one who can state without a smile that buttermilk containing as much as three-fourths of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating. The object of that one-half of 1 per cent provision, as originally put into the Treasury regulations, was merely to provide a measure of defining where the revenue began. We inquired of the Treasury Department, and were informed that there was nothing connected with the intoxicating quality of the beverage considered when that regulation was adopted.

The committee made very earnest investigation and study of the question to see whether it could fairly be stated that 4 per cent beer was intoxicating. There is a difference of opinion. There are undoubtedly physicians who would testify that it was intoxicating, although the persons who so testified before the committee admitted they did not know anything about it from personal experience. But there were many distinguished scientists who appeared before the committee and who testified that it was not intoxicating.

Mr. President, when the question came before the Supreme Court as to whether the Congress had the right to declare that one-half of 1 per cent was intoxicating, when as a matter of fact no scientist could possibly get up in a court and, under oath, testify that it was intoxicating, the Supreme Court decided that it was the right of the Congress to determine whatever it thought in this matter, provided it was a reasonable interpretation. I submit that in view of the fact that many distinguished physiologists and physicians have testified that 4 per cent beer is not intoxicating, that it takes an enormous quantity of it to produce intoxication, the matter is open to decision by the Congress. I offer this amendment because I believe that it would produce far more revenue than the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland.

As a matter of fact, good Pilsener beer, obtained normally in Germany, and sold as Pilsener, contains slightly less than 4 per cent alcohol. Beer containing 2.75 per cent alcohol by volume is not considered very palatable.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in order that we may get the facts before the Senate, may I say that a beer containing 4 per cent of alcohol by volume would contain about 3.6 per cent alcohol by weight?

Mr. BINGHAM. If I may correct the Senator, it is 3.2 per cent.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BINGHAM. The testimony before the committee was that 3.2 per cent by weight is equivalent to 4 per cent by volume.

I submit this amendment, Mr. President, honestly believing that the Supreme Court, if the question were brought before it for decision, would say that in this ground of some doubt, with distinguished experts testifying on both sides, the Congress would be entirely within its proper jurisdiction in determining the alcoholic content of beer which might be sold legally.

I submit that if there were any justification whatsoever for the Congress of the United States going so far as to say that buttermilk and ginger ale containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol was intoxicating, there is equal justification for the Congress saying that in the face of the doubt expressed by various scientists, and the honest opinion expressed by most distinguished scientists, the Congress has a right to say that 4 per cent beer is not intoxicating in fact, and may be manufactured and sold legally under the Constitution.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I intend to vote against both of these propositions, and I am inclined to think that I shall vote against all propositions which would tamper with the Volstead Act, unless and until there shall be some authoritative declaration as to what is the proper alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage.

I regret very much to state again that I was the unfortunate author of the resolution under which the so-called Wickersham Commission got its existence. One of the purposes, if not the primary purpose, of the appropriation of $500,000 of the taxpayers' money for that commission was that we might reach a conclusion on this controverted point. In other words, I had confidently supposed that the Wickersham Commission, authorized by Congress and under an appropriation of Congress, would first of all consider that very proposition, and arrive at some approximately scientific conclusion as to the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage. For months and months it sidestepped the whole question, and the chairman of the commission himself, in an address in the State of Connecticut, the home of the distinguished Senator who has just spoken, ridiculed the idea that the commission would deal seriously with the prohibition problem; and they did not deal with it until the murmurings and the threats that were made on the floor of the Senate compelled them to do so.

I think the Wickersham Commission was morally derelict in not then determining, as nearly as may be determined, what is a scientific and proper alcoholic content in an intoxicating beverage.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator remember that in the appendix of the Wickersham report there were individual expressions of opinion from more than half of the members of that commission, to the effect that the eighteenth amendment ought to be repealed or altered?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but there was no determination of what might be done under the existing constitutional amendment, the repeal of which is beset with almost insuperable obstacles, and it was plainly the duty of that commission to reach such a determination, so that those of us in Congress who have never had any experience in getting intoxicated might learn what is really an intoxicating beverage.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. Having in mind the statement of the Senator from Virginia with regard to seeking some definite judgment or opinion relative to what really constitutes intoxicating liquor, would not the proper way, almost the only way, to get a definite decision upon that point be for Congress to fix the amount of alcoholic content which, in its judgment, is the correct content, and have a case submitted to the Supreme Court for final decision on that point?

Mr. GLASS. My response to that would be that Congress is not prepared to exercise any accurate judgment on the question. Congress has already fixed the content at one-half of 1 per cent, and most people say that that is a ridiculous standard. Congress is not prepared to express any judgment on that point, and it ought to be done by an authoritative commission appointed by Congress, and should have been done by the Wickersham Commission, which sidestepped the whole issue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, further debate is out of order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. TYDINGS asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I transfer that pair to my colleague the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay." The Senior Senator from Colorado, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SCHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. If the senior Senator from Tennessee were present, he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

NOT VOTING—11

Black	Dale	McKellar	Swanson
Bulkley	Gore	Schall	Waterman
Byrnes	Hebert	Shipstead

So the amendment of Mr. TYDINGS was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 241, after line 11, it is proposed to strike out:

(2) Brewer's wort, liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract, fluid, solid, or condensed (unless sold to a baker for use in baking or to a manufacturer of malted milk or medicinal products for use in the manufacture of such products), if containing less than 15 per cent of solids by weight, 5 cents a gallon; if containing 15 per cent or more of solids by weight, 35 cents a gallon.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(2) Brewer's wort, 15 cents a gallon. Liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract, fluid, solid, or condensed, made from malted cereal grains in whole or in part, unless sold to a baker for use in baking or to a manufacturer or producer of malted milk, medicinal products, foods, cereal beverages, or textiles, for use in the manufacture or production of such products, 3 cents a pound. For the purposes of this paragraph liquid malt containing less than 15 per cent of solids by weight shall be taxable as brewer's wort.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the close of the session yesterday the question of the tax upon brewer's wort was under discussion. I was asked by the Senator from New York to inquire of the commissioner of industrial alcohol, Dr. J. M. Doran, as to certain phases of the proposed tax on wort and its relationship to malt. I have now a letter from Doctor Doran which I should like to read. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL,
Washington, May 18, 1932.

Memorandum for Senator SMOOT.

Complying with your request for views on certain phases of the wort and malt sirup tax schedule in the pending revenue bill, I would advise as follows:

It requires approximately 1 bushel of malted barley to produce 1 barrel of wort. Should a tax be imposed on malt it would mean the equivalent of $4.65 per bushel of barley to bring it in line with the present proposed tax of 15 cents per gallon on wort. Furthermore, it has been common practice for many years to use unmalted corn grits and corn sugar in the manufacture of beer wort and malt sirup, and as the practice is not uniform and is regarded as more or less in the nature of a trade secret it is believed that a tax on barley malt or any other malted cereal would not meet the revenue requirements in this section of the pending bill, and such a provision would be very difficult of administration.

Malting operations can not very well be carried out on a small scale, and inasmuch as several days are required for malting operations it is not believed that a commercial wort plant could defeat the revenue by malting their own barley or other grains. On the other hand, the brewing of wort in substantial quantities by a commercial plant is of such character as to make the operation difficult of concealment and should render the collection of revenue much less difficult than would be the case if levies were made on the malted grains themselves without any account being taken of the subsequent use of corn grits and corn sugar, which are articles of wide commercial use. It seems to me that it would be quite difficult to administratively take care of the exemptions for the good and medicinal uses of malt sirups if the sole tax were to be levied on malted barley or other grains.

With respect to the question of possible conversion of malt sirup into wort by dilution with water, in the proportion of 1 part of malt sirup to 5 parts of water, it is my opinion that such a possible dilution would not affect the collection of the proposed tax on wort. The reason is that the first manufacturing cost of sirup is higher than wort, due to the necessary evaporation costs, and, furthermore, a diluted malt sirup will not produce as satisfactory a beverage as a straight brewer's wort. This observation is based somewhat on knowledge of changes that take place during evaporation of sugar solutions and on the practical experience that the use of diluted malt sirup for the manufacture of a beverage has been replaced in large part, at least commercially, by the manufacture of wort and its use direct without any intermediate evaporation process. I feel, therefore, there is little probability of evasion of the proposed wort tax through the medium of diluted malt sirup with water to wort consistency.

Of the total quantity of malt sirup manufactured approximately 25 per cent goes to unquestioned and identified food, medicinal, and technical processes, and the proposed section makes ample provision for tax exemption of these particular uses.

Commercial malt sugar at present sells for about 15 cents per pound on the best information available at this time. I do not believe the use of malt sugar would be a means of evasion of tax, as the malt sugar alone would not produce a satisfactory beverage, and the cost appears to be quite high.

J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Industrial Alcohol.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the letter deal with the provision in the bill as it came from the House, or with the amendment reported by the Senate committee?

Mr. SMOOT. It deals with the provision reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does Doctor Doran favor it?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; he favors the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. President, before the Senator from New York begins, I should like to say one further word. The Senator expressed the view that the estimate of $97,000,000 as the revenue to be derived, as stated by me, must be a mistake. He had an estimate of $46,000,000. The estimate of $46,000,000 is correct if made upon the basis of the provision of the House bill, but if the Senate committee amendment shall be adopted it will produce, according to the estimate made by Doctor Doran, $97,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee. I also hand a copy of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from New York be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee it is proposed to insert:

(2) Malt, $1.10 per bushel, provided that there shall be allowed to the manufacturer of malt products sold to a baker for use in baking or to a manufacturer or producer of malted milk, medicinal products, foods, cereal beverages, or textiles, for use in the manufacture of such products, a refund of the amount of tax paid on the malt used in the manufacture of such malt products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the vote is taken, I should like to say that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York would bring about the difficulties mentioned by Doctor Doran. Not only that, but the amendment provides for a refund of the tax collected on such portions of the product as go into foods, cereal beverages, medicinal products, and so forth. No one can tell what effect that would have without breaking the whole amendment down and finding exactly how much each one of the items named would affect the revenue. I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we have before us a revenue bill. It is the desire of every Member of this body to balance the Budget. In order to do so, there must be large sums of money raised by taxation.

If I believed that the amendment offered by the committee would raise the sum of $97,000,000 I would sit down and let the Senate vote, ending any activity of my own to change it.

But it is only right that the Senate should be put in the possession of the facts. Against the statement of the Senator from Utah, who says that this tax will raise $97,000,000 as written, I want to make the statement that it will not raise to exceed $9,000,000. This positive statement having been made, and I believe it to be true, I think we have a right to inquire from the chairman of the committee how the Treasury or anybody else figures that the revenue will be $97,000,000.

May I ask the Senator from Utah how we are going to get $97,000,000 out of this proposal?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator I will say that the amount of $97,000,000 is based upon what the department knows to be the known production of wort in the United States. The tax provided for upon the production of wort in the United States will bring $97,000,000. If the Senator says nine-tenths of all of it will not be taxed, then the amount of revenue suggested by him may be correct, but the department knows the amount of wort that is produced in the United States. There is not any guesswork at all about it; and with a tax imposed of 15 cents per gallon, the amount that was produced last year will bring $97,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I pray that the Finance Committee is better informed about the other items in this tax bill than the Senator from Utah is informed regarding the possibility of receipts from this item. This item, as written and presented by the committee, will not bring in revenue to exceed $9,000,000.

This morning I talked with Doctor Doran. His letter was just read by the Senator from Utah. Doctor Doran told me that we manufacture in this country annually between 400,000,000 and 500,000,000 pounds of malt extract or malt sirup. Twenty-five per cent of this goes to the bakers and the textile makers and the legitimate users of malt; so we have left 300,000,000 pounds of malt sirup. At 3 cents a pound that would bring in $9,000,000.

The only argument the Senator from Utah can make is that malt sirup or extract will not be used in making beer, but that the beer will be made from wort. That is what the Senator said. He has no more proof of it than he has regarding the inhabitants of the planet Mars. If all the beer were made from wort, the revenue would not be $97.000,000.

There is a sure way to determine how much beer is being made in the United States. This whole subject is distasteful to me because, as I said yesterday, beer is not a favorite beverage. I am not interested in this item except because I want revenue to operate the Government.

My State pays one-third of the taxes of this country. There are no Senators having greater interest in this matter of balancing the Budget than my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] and myself. There can be no other Senators with greater interest. We want revenue, but it can not be had from this absurd amendment offered by the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment that is in the bill, offered by the Committee on Finance of the Senate, was prepared in Doctor Doran's office. While I am perfectly willing to admit what the Senator says, that I do not know a single, solitary thing about it, I have not quoted my knowledge, but I think I know as much about it as the Senator does.

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps the Senator would not be bragging in saying that.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it; and I am not bragging, because I say I do not know very much about it. The Government, however, is to receive the revenue. The officials and the experts of the department say that we will receive this amount of money, and the Government itself is more interested than any one individual Senator could possibly be in receiving the money to carry on the Government activities.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall try to demonstrate the truth of what I have said. The Senator says he does not know anything about the matter, anyhow, so I suppose I might as well sit down and call it a day. At least, I have studied the question, which he admits he has not done. He has blindly accepted what somebody told him, and I never knew him to do that before.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not done it this time.

Mr. COPELAND. I have looked upon the Senator as a wise man who has conscientiously tried to present to the Senate and the country the needs of the Treasury; and in every other instance save this, perhaps, he has done his full duty. I will give him that tribute, but in this matter he has blindly followed the blind.

There is a sure way to find out how much beer is made in America. Doctor Doran told me this, so I assume it is correct. He says that the amount of hops raised in America—and hopvines can not be hidden, I think the Senator from Utah and I will agree about that—the amount of hops raised in America indicates that 20,000,000 barrels of beer made in the United States are consumed here. I do not know how much may be consumed that comes from other countries, but that is not under consideration. With 20,000,000 barrels of beer, at 31 gallons to a barrel, we have, in round numbers, 600,000,000 gallons of beer. That is the amount that we consume in the United States—600,000,000 gallons of beer.

Of this amount, it is estimated that one-third will go into illicit beer. That amount of hops will be used in an illegitimate way. One-ninth of the hops production will go into the making of cereal beverage. Upon the illicit beer and upon the cereal beverage there can be no tax. So that leaves one-half of the total production of hops to be used in malt products which might be brought under the tax proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that all of the wort that goes into the illicit beer is taxed just as well as that which goes into the beer that is called legitimate. It all pays its tax, whether it is illegitimate beer or whether it is legitimate beer.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, under the proposed bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and upon the Senator's own statement of 600,000,000 gallons at 15 cents a gallon, that is $90,000,000 right there.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. If the Senator is consoled by that, I am very happy.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only quoting the figures that the Senator quoted.

Mr. COPELAND. All right; but I want to say to the Senator that the beer will not be made of wort. It will be made of malt extract. Of course, Doctor Doran doubts this in his letter. I heard his letter. He says the flavor of malt-extract beer is not so good. He is better informed on that subject than I am. He says that the flavor of beer made from wort is better than the flavor of beer made from malt extract.

Mr. SMOOT. But we tax malt extract.

Mr. COPELAND. I know. If the Senator will only be patient, you tax malt extract at 3 cents a pound. Is that right?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right; and very, very little of it has been used for making beer. Not only that, but there never will be much used as long as they can get wort.

Mr. COPELAND. I am surprised at what the Senator says, because he has just quoted from Doctor Doran, who told me that between four and five hundred million pounds of malt extract are made in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not made into beer.

Mr. COPELAND. What is it made into? That is a fair question. The Senator says it is not made into beer. What is it made into?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not tell the Senator all the products.

Mr. COPELAND. I can.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, however, that over a fourth of it, nearly a third, goes into other products. So the testimony showed; and I could turn to the testimony and tell the Senator what it went into.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator does not have to go to the testimony. He can take his own bill.

Mr. SMOOT. About one-third of it goes into those other products. The bill does not say where it goes.

Mr. COPELAND. It says what the exemptions are; and, of course, the Senator is talking about legitimate uses now.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. He has said what it goes into. If the Senator will turn to page 241, he will find that it goes into baking, malted milk, medicinal products, foods, cereal beverages, and textiles. That is where 25 per cent of it goes. One-fourth of this malt extract goes into these legitimate purposes which the Senator did not know about but which I found in his bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not know where all of it went. The Senator from New York asked me what it went into, and I could not tell him as to all of it; but the bill itself says that most of it goes into these products.

Mr. COPELAND. That is where it goes.

Mr. SMOOT. There are only 30,000,000 gallons of malt sirup made in the United States, as against 600,000,000 gallons of wort. If they could make beer as the Senator suggests, they would have done it in the past the same as they would in the future. Anyone who is going to make beer is not going to use malt sirup to make it when he can get wort.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish I had some power to induce the Senator from Utah to listen to the argument. If he will do that, when I get through, if he says it is not any good, I will be content, and probably say that he knows more about the matter than I do. It is ridiculous for a man who has said he does not know anything about it to rise here and say that all the malt extract we make is put into these products the Senator is talking about, these legitimate products.

Mr. SMOOT. One-fourth of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well, one-fourth of it. Then what happens to the other 300,000,000 pounds of malt extract? Where does that go?

Mr. SMOOT. At the request of the Senator, I will wait until he gets through and will not interrupt him.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not blame the Senator, because he has not the answer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that about one-fourth of this product goes into beer only?

Mr. COPELAND. No; the Senator did not say that.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand it, wort is nothing more nor less than beer, without the yeast added.

Mr. SMOOT. There are 30,000,000 gallons of malt sirup. We were talking of malt sirup.

Mr. TYDINGS. We are certainly not going to tax this thing now, after the vote we have just had, going into the back door, when nobody is looking, with a cloak thrown over our heads, and thereby get revenue which we would not get honestly. I hope we will not be that two-faced and say that we will not get the revenue from a tax on beer, when everybody knows that product is going into beer. Are we going to be so cowardly, if I may use that word without any offense, as to refuse to place a tax on beer and then, when nobody is looking, disguise ourselves and, as tax collectors, go in and get the tax indirectly?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Maryland in connection with the same proposition, as I recall, a district court of the United States has declared wort to be contraband under the Volstead Act. All this provision in the bill proposes to do indirectly, and by implication, is to legalize wort for beverage purposes, I assume. I am not familiar with just what are the secret processes of the chairman's mind, but by imposing a tax, at least by implication, we will make wort a legalized product and take it from under the prohibition of the Volstead Act. I assume that may be the purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. In just a moment I will yield. I do not want this argument to deteriorate into a passage at arms over the question of prohibition. Everybody who knows anything about the question and about this bill knows that the intention of this provision of the bill is indirectly to tax illicit beer. That is what it is for. We all know that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield now?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I just want to get over the point, having made some little investigation recently, that wort is nothing more than beer. That is all it is. A barrel of wort is a barrel of beer. The Senator from Wisconsin is exactly right when he says that the purpose is to legalize an illegal product. It is on all fours with the action of Congress in lending about $20,000,000 to the concentrate industry to make wine. We never got a cent of tax from that, but we let them have $20,000,000, most of which now we will not get back. So that what we will not do openly, as men standing out in the sunlight, where we can be observed, we are asked to do surreptitiously, throwing the glamor of a disguise over our actions, and thereby making it appear that we have not deserted the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, after these diverting remarks, I want to go back to my argument with the Senator from Utah. He is a reasonable man, and I know that when he gets the real facts before him he is going to join me in my effort to so shape the pending bill as to get revenue out of it, instead of having it prove to be the greatest disappointment in the revenue bill. I want to go back to what I was saying when we were diverted.

Doctor Doran states what the statistical departments of the Government verify, that we make about 400,000,000 pounds of malt extract or malt sirup. One-fourth of that amount, as the Senator from Utah has said, and said correctly, goes into legitimate uses, in the bakery and textile and malted-milk industries, into medicines, and so forth. That leaves 300,000,000 pounds of malt extract. What becomes of that? A large part of it goes into the making of illicit beer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have heard it stated that there is a large amount of home-brew manufactured throughout the United States. What is the home-brew, made in the cellar or in the kitchen by the frugal housewife or the frugal husband, made from?

Mr. COPELAND. I am informed, having no practical knowledge, that it is made from malt extract.

Mr. KING. Not from wort?

Mr. COPELAND. Not from wort. The illegal wort is used largely by the alley brewers, the bootleggers. That is where the wort goes. But the household uses the malt extract. It is not so bulky, it comes in small tins, and is more readily used.

Three hundred million pounds of malt extract are employed beyond legitimate uses. That much will go into the making of illicit beer, and that the Senator would tax at 3 cents a pound, and out of it we will get $9,000,000, and that is all we will get.

The only difference between malt extract or malt sirup and wort lies in the fact that the water of the wort has been evaporated and there is a concentration of the product, making malt extract. Bear that in mind. The malt extract is simply the concentrated, condensed wort. You can take milk powder and the right proportion of butterfat and add water and homogenize it, and you have reconstituted milk. To make wort, all you have to do is to take the malt extract, add water, and you have wort. Nobody is going to use wort, which would bear a tax of 15 cents a gallon, when he can get malt extract with a tax of 3 cents a pound.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I am very anxious to know whether or not the Senator is absolutely correct in his definition of malt sirup. Malt sirup, when it contains hops, then is the concentrated form of wort made from malt and hops.

Mr. COPELAND. It may be hopped; yes. Hops may be added.

Mr. BLAINE. But when the malt sirup is nonhopped, then the process for making beer is to pour hot water on the hops—the same as you pour hot water on tea leaves to make tea—in order to get the hop flavor, and in that is mixed the malt sirup. I have never had any personal experience, I want to assure the Senator, but that is my information, which comes from the same sources from which we obtain general information on many processing projects. So that malt sirup, together with a small pinch of hops, in the right proportions, when properly mixed with liquid, becomes exactly the same as wort.

Mr. COPELAND. Just the same, exactly. Let us go a little further, though, so as to be scientifically accurate.

The Senator from Wisconsin will remember that the germinated grain is crushed, put into a cylinder, water is added, and it is heated to the right temperature to permit the conversion of the starch into sugar. It is malt sugar when that happens. Then pretty soon the husks settle down to the bottom of the vessel, shaped like an inverted cone, and the fluid is strained through the husks into a kettle, into a receptacle, and that is wort, but not yet hopped, no hops having been added. That is wort. Then the wort may be submitted to evaporation or condensation, making it into sirup, and then you have malt sirup. If you go far enough with your evaporation, you may actually have a malt powder, but the hops have not yet been added.

In making beer, of course, the hops are added, with some beet sugar or cane sugar to promote the fermentation.

The iniquities of the bill are shown by the fact that the rate on malt extract is utterly out of proportion to the tax on wort. One bushel of malt will make 27 pounds of malt sirup. One bushel of malt will make 30 gallons of wort. The tax on wort, at 15 cents a gallon, would be $4.50. One bushel of malt will make 27 pounds of malt sirup or malt extract, which at 3 cents a pound would amount to 81 cents.

Is there any doubt as to what the bootlegger is going to do? Is there any doubt about what the householder is going to do? Of course, they will use malt extract. There is no question about that, because with the malt extract bearing a tax of less than a dollar, they can make as much beer as they would out of wort, on which they would pay a tax of $4.50. That is plain enough, is it not? That is not the way to collect revenue, because this tax bill will drive all of the bootleggers and householders into the making of illicit beer out of malt extract, upon which we will realize $9,000,000 of revenue, and that is all. I do not care how many letters are produced or how many experts are called in to testify, the fact remains that the beer of the future will be produced out of malt extract and this downtrodden and tax-ridden country will have no revenue from it.

I do not suppose I have changed the opinion of my friend across the aisle one bit, but that is the truth. When he tells the country that in balancing the Budget he has found a way to get $97,000,000, I tell the country that it is not a fact. To make up that loss we have got to find $88,000,000 from some other source.

My friend from Utah knows that a case contains 12 cans of malt extract. Sixty gallons of beer can be made out of 12 cans of malt extract. One can contains 3 pounds. There are 36 pounds in a case of malt extract at 3 cents a pound will be a tax of $1.08, while to make 60 gallons of beer out of wort would take 60 gallons of wort at 15 cents a gallon or $9. Is there any doubt about how the beer will be made? The beer will be made from the malt extract and the Government will receive $1.08 instead of receiving $9 on the 60 gallons of beer. After the amendment of the committee is accepted and the bill is put into operation it will give me joy next year to say, "I told you so"; and I am going to be just mean enough to do it.

What is my proposal? My proposal is that we tax malt $1.10 a bushel. Malt is the basic substance. In a sense it is the raw material. It does not make any difference whether we are making malt sugar or wort or malt extract, it all comes from malt, from the germinated grain. I propose that we tax it $1.10 a bushel. The reason why I chose that rate is that it is the old rate we used to place upon whisky—$1.10 a gallon. I have another reason for doing it. I want to be sure that the Government will get $20,000,000 instead of $9,000,000.

I want to make this very clear, and if I seem to be elementary in this statement I hope Senators will forgive me: To make wort or to make malt extract, we take grain, usually barley. It is first soaked or steeped in water and then put on the floor of the malt house and the temperature kept high enough so it germinates. Senators know how it is when they go down the cellar in the springtime and find a lot of potatoes struggling to live, putting forth green sprouts. That is what the grain does. The barley is kept at the right temperature and it germinates, and when it germinates in that way it is called malt. That is the basic substance. From malt by these different stages we make wort and malt extract.

We first take raw malt, the germinated malt, and shake it up so as to break off the little green sprouts. We crush the grain, add water, and heat the mixture enough so that the sugar fermentation takes place. As a result the starch of the grain is converted into sugar, invert sugar, very valuable sugar for health. It is given to babies. Doctor Kellogg, at the Battle Creek Sanitarium, makes great use of malt sugar. He has an aversion to other sugar and feeds his patients on malt sugar. Then it is strained, the fluid taken off, which is the wort, and the wort is condensed and evaporated and the extract made.

The trouble with the bill is that instead of going to the top and beginning with the basic material, it skips the malt, it skips the malt sugar, and then begins to apply when it gets to wort, and the next tax after that is on the malt extract. The malt extract, being so much cheaper by reason of these low taxes than the wort, will lead to its use. Because of that fact and the fact that it is used now to the extent of 300,000,000 pounds for this purpose, it means that the revenue which the Government will get will be 3 cents a pound or a total revenue of $9,000,000.

My purpose is to put a tax of $1.10 on the malt. I have said malt, because sometimes we malt corn or rye or wheat. We will get an increased revenue estimated at about $250,000 if these other malted substances are included in the tax. Let us put a tax of $1.10 on malt and each bushel of the barley or corn makes a bushel of malt. Multiply 20,000,000 bushels, the minimum—the estimate runs all the way from 20,000,000 to 40,000,000, but nobody denies it is at least 20,000,000—by $1.10 and we get $22,200,000. Taking off the 6 per cent which is now used for bakery purposes and for which my amendment provides, will leave net more than $20,000,000.

I want to say to the public, more interested in the matter of balancing the Budget than perhaps Senators are, that this will net the United States Government more than $20,000,000 as against $9,000,000 as proposed by the committee.

I do not know that there is anything more that can be said. It would be very easy to talk a long time about it because, in spite of what the Senator from Utah said, I do know about this subject. As I said yesterday, I happened to take a course in organic chemistry when I was a student, a course which appealed to me, and I learned something about these things then. I have never been in a brewery. I am not interested in that side of the question, but I know that the processes which I have described are scientifically accurate and that the Senate has it within its power to put into the Treasury of the United States by this simple method, a system which can not be evaded, over $20,000,000 as against $9,000,000 as proposed by the committee.

The committee has left loopholes through which a horse and wagon can be driven. There is no reason at all why the person who wants to make cheap beer can not use barley malt. There is no reason why the alley brewer can not buy malt sugar, the next process beyond the malting. He can strain it himself and make beer from it.

When I say that the bill as presented offers $9,000,000 income, I say it offers that much provided there are no evasions. My amendment offers a simple means of collection. The Senator from Utah has presented an amendment which provides for a tax of 3 cents a pound on malt extract. Anybody can buy wort and make it himself. He is not likely to do it because of the difference in price. My amendment means that only 25 concerns in the United States will be involved. There are only 25 malt concerns in the country, great concerns, each of them occupying acres of ground. Uncle Sam will go to 25 places in the United States and collect his revenue and will put into the coffers of the country over $20,000,000 net.

I appeal to the Senator from Utah, in charge of the bill, to accept advice on this matter and to permit a modification of the bill in such a way as not to reduce income, and in such manner as to double the receipts of the Government from this particular tax. I do not want to discuss the prohibition aspects of the case or the other matters which have been brought in by the heels. I am thinking of this merely as a revenue measure. I have offered my country to-day more than $10,000,000 of revenue if my amendment shall be accepted. It should be accepted, because all the scientific facts are on the side of the argument which I have presented. In the name of the country and of the need of the Treasury to be replenished, I ask the Senator to accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not prepared to take out of the bill $97,000,000. That is about what the Senator's amendment would mean. The department which enforces the law ought to know as much about it as any one individual who buys or uses the wort. The department of our Government says it will get $97,000,000 out of this amendment. It has said it not only once, but it has been checked up two or three times.

I care nothing at all about what the Senator from New York has said in relation to myself. I may know nothing about wort—it is true that I may not. However, his amendment is not in the interest of the Government of the United States. It is not in behalf of the Treasury of the United States. Therefore, I can not accept the amendment. Let the Senator offer the amendment and we will vote on it.

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment on page 241, it is proposed to insert the following:

(2) Malt, $1.10 per bushel, provided that there shall be allowed to the manufacturer of malt products sold to a baker for use in baking or to a manufacturer or producer of malted milk, medicinal products, foods, cereal beverages, or textiles, for use in the manufacture of such products, a refund of the amount of tax paid on the malt used in the manufacture of such malt products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I make that transfer and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. MCNARY's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the negative). I understand the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] has not voted. As I have a pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire if the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WAGNER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] has a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained from the Chamber on official business.

I also desire to state that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 68, as follows:

So Mr. COPELAND's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 241, line 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 242, after line 5, to strike out:

(3) Grape syrup, grape concentrate, and evaporated grape juice, if containing more than 35 per cent of sugars by weight and not containing preservative sufficient to prevent fermentation when diluted, 40 per cent of the price for which sold, or in the case of such articles imported into the United States, 40 per cent ad valorem.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(3) Grape concentrate, evaporated grape juice, and grape syrup (other than finished or fountain syrup), if containing more than 35 per cent of sugars by weight, 20 cents a gallon. No tax shall be imposed under this paragraph (A) upon any article which contains preservative sufficient to prevent fermentation when diluted, or (B) upon any article sold to a manufacturer or producer of food products or soft drinks for use in the manufacture or production of such products.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 242, after line 22, to strike out:

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, 1 cent a gallon; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(4) Crude petroleum, one-half cent per gallon; fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil and gasoline or other motor fuel, one-half cent per gallon; gasoline or other motor fuel, 2½ cents per gallon; lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound; natural asphalt and asphalt and bitumen derived from petroleum, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we have reached that part of the bill which pertains to some tariff items. I had hoped that we might get a unanimous-consent agreement to defer the consideration of the four tariff items until we had completed the other provisions in the bill; but on conferring with some of the Senators who are interested in these items, I find that they are very much opposed to that procedure and desire that we shall go on as the items are reached in the bill. That being their viewpoint, I recognize that it would be impossible to follow any other course.

In the House a certain rate was placed on crude petroleum. The Senate committee struck that rate out and inserted another provision. I ask unanimous consent that a motion may be in order to strike both the House and the Senate committee provisions from the bill. I make this request in order that we may get rid of the subject in one motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Several Senators rose.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill as it passed the House carried one rate, and the Senate committee fixed another rate. The Senate committee rate is lower than the rate fixed in the House. Some of us are against both provisions, both the Senate committee provision and the House provision; and if a motion to strike them both out is carried, it will eliminate both. Otherwise those who are opposed to both provisions would have to vote first for the rate of half a cent a gallon on crude oil that is found in the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Mississippi to state in his address yesterday that the committee was trying to have the bill stand as it came from the committee. Was not that the Senator's contention yesterday?

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure that if the Senator got that idea he is the only Senator here who did, because I have voted and I have spoken against tariff items being injected into the consideration of this bill. I think the country understands my position on that question. I am very anxious that the other provisions except the tariff items remain as the committee recommended them. Of course, I am opposed to the tariff items.

Mr. LONG. Did not the Senator say yesterday that if we started tearing up the bill, we would find ourselves in endless confusion?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think the Senate understands my position with reference to the tariff items. I have submitted this unanimous-consent request in order to save time and expedite the consideration of the bill. If there is any objection to it, of course we will proceed with the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask the Senator to yield merely in order that I may explain why I am going to object.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator objects, that disposes of the request.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that if I am going to object, I have a right to say why. I do not see any reason why, with all the zeal of the Senator from Mississippi, this particular item should be treated in any different way from the way in which we are treating all other revenue items in the bill. So I shall object to lumping the whole item into one vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Texas has objected. It is proposed here to raise $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year from a tariff on copper. I fail to perceive why in a revenue bill an item that will raise fifteen or twenty million dollars a year should be put over until the last. I am very glad the Senator objected. Let us proceed with the bill as the items appear. There is no reason I can perceive why one item should be postponed until another shall have been considered. Let each one stand on its own merits and be considered when the Senate reaches it. I, too, object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was not requesting that anything be put over at all. We have reached the item now. I was just asking unanimous consent that I might enter a motion to strike out both the House text and the Senate committee provision with reference to crude oil. That is all. If that is objected to, of course the question comes on the adoption of the Senate committee amendment to the House text.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate committee amendment now pending should be agreed to, would it then be in order to strike out the House provision as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that if the Senate committee amendment is agreed to, then it would not be in order to move to strike out the House provision.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I appreciate that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to reach the point of striking both out, the Senator must make his motion to strike out the House provision before we vote on the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I was trying to strike them both out.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator can not do that, because objection is made. I do not want the parliamentary situation to become such that the Senator would be out of order when he undertook to strike out the House provision as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. If I should make a motion to strike out the House provision and the Senate committee amendment, then it is amendable by a motion to strike out and insert the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If Senators will observe the ruling of the Chair, those of us who are opposed, as the Senator from Mississippi is, to any tariff being levied on this product, will get ourselves into difficulty if we go on and vote for the Senate committee amendment. If it is agreed to, we shall then be bound by that action.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the ruling of the Chair, and objection having been made, the only procedure for those who are opposed to any tax on oil is to vote first against the Senate committee amendment, and then the question recurs on the House provision, and we shall have to vote against that.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all true; but suppose the Senate committee amendment is agreed to and the Senator is in favor of not having any tariff. He would be denied the privilege of even making a motion to that effect.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; we are up against it then.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would it not be in order to secure a division upon the proposal? It is a proposal to strike out and insert. May we not ask for a division of the question and have a vote on the proposal to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under Rule XVIII a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, another parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it be in order, while the committee amendment is pending, to move to strike out the House text?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment does that.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee amendment now pending would strike out and insert. Would it be in order now to make a motion to strike out the House provision?

Mr. HARRISON. That is already stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the object of the committee amendment, to strike out the House provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Chair by his ruling is going to get us in a position where we will not be able to make a motion to strike out the House provision which would eliminate any tariff on this product.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, does not the question first come on the committee amendment to the House text, and does not the question then recur on the committee amendment as amended?

Mr. NORRIS. But it is not an amendment as amended. It is the House text.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, unanimous consent was given to consider all Senate committee amendments first.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg to differ with the Senator from Utah. I do not think that unanimous consent has been given.

Mr. NORRIS. Irrespective of whether it was given or not, the Chair must not get the Senate in a position so that those Members of the Senate who are opposed to any tariff on oil will be precluded from having a vote on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only remedy under the rule is to vote down the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that those who are opposed to any tariff can defeat the Senate committee amendment. When that is done, they can then make a motion to amend the House text by striking it all out.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. CONNALLY. What more does the Senator from Nebraska want?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me explain. The House text provides for a tax of 1 cent, and the Senate committee amendment provides for a tax of one-half cent. A perfectly logical position for Senators to take who are opposed to any tariff would be to get as low a tariff as possible if they can not prevent any tariff. Hence it would be to their interest, believing that way, to vote for the committee amendment cutting the tax down to one-half a cent, but by doing that under the ruling of the Chair they are prohibited from ever having an opportunity to vote to have the entire tariff on oil eliminated from the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that perhaps one way out of the difficulty would be to offer, as a substitute for the committee amendment, an amendment to the House text striking out the numeral "1," in line 24, and inserting "one-half"?

Mr. HARRISON. I was about to make the motion, and I will now make the motion, to strike out everything on page 242, beginning with line 23, and on page 243 down to, and including, line 13. That would strike out the House text and the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to make a suggestion to the Chair. I think it is perfectly plain that if we follow the two rulings of the Chair a Senator will have to vote against his own convictions on the first question in order ever to stand any chance of getting an opportunity to vote his real convictions on the second question. I want to ask the Chair why this rule does not apply. A motion to strike out and amend is subject to a motion that would amend or perfect the text before the question is voted on. In other words, in order to do that why is it not in order now to move to strike out of the bill the House text so there would be no tariff? Then every Senator would have an opportunity to vote his convictions on all the matters involved.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, with other Senators, I am anxious to secure relief for the copper-mining industry, but we scorn and reject a victory obtained by any parliamentary trick. Every Senator has a right to vote on each question fairly and squarely without any subterfuge. So, on behalf of a number of Senators who are trying to secure proper and needed tariffs, we wish it understood that we would not accept a victory predicated upon or arising from any parliamentary sharp practice. Therefore, so far as the ground in a parliamentary sense may be cleared, we wish it to be cleared, and we wish to have a fair and square vote.

I perceive no difficulty in the situation. There is to me no complexity about the question. The question is presented as it has been presented all through the bill and will be after these tariff items shall have been concluded. The question is on the Senate committee amendment. If it be adopted, then the question recurs on the committee amendment as amended by the Senate. What else does the Senator from Nebraska want? What else is there?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said the question would be on the amendment as amended. There is no such thing. It is the House text.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senate makes the amendment. If that be adopted by the Senate, then the question recurs——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; there is where the Senator is in error.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I have fallen into a deep sea, parliamentarily.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to submit this to the Chair as well as to the Senator from Arizona. Suppose the Senate committee amendment is agreed to. Under the ruling of the Chair, as I understand it, that ends the matter. It is not subject to another amendment, but that ends it, and there is no possibility of another vote on the question.

The Senator from Arizona, I think, is laboring under a misapprehension that if the Senate committee amendment is agreed to, then we have to vote on the amendment as amended; but that is not true. The Senate committee amendment is an amendment of the text of the bill, and when that is amended then the text of the bill is changed. Under the ruling of the Chair there is no way to change it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I make this suggestion to the Chair? In the way the bill has come to us from the Printing Office it looks as though the whole paragraph of the House text has been stricken out and replaced by committee language. That is not the fact, however, in essence, for if the Chair will look at the bill he will see that the first two words of the House paragraph are not changed. Consequently we have this situation: The paragraph that comes from the House is not entirely stricken out by the Senate committee amendment but is only modified by the committee amendment after the first two words. That being so, and assuming that the Senate votes for the committee amendment, a motion would then be in order to strike from the bill the entire paragraph as amended. I submit to the Chair that that is necessarily so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken, because the language of the House provision puts a tax of 1 cent per gallon on crude petroleum, and so forth, whereas the Senate committee amendment puts an entirely different rate of tax upon those items. It puts a tariff of one-half cent on oil. The language is transposed so that it is entirely different. It is really a striking out of the entire language of the House text and a substitution of new language provided by the Senate committee.

Mr. REED. That is the way the Printing Office has sent it to us; but the first two words of the paragraph and the last sentence of the paragraph remain the same.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the first two words, if left to themselves, make no sense at all.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. My inquiry is, if subsection (4) is stricken out and a new subsection (4) is inserted by the Senate, is the Chair treating subsection (4) as involved in the amendment to strike out and insert?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the position of the Chair. The House text can be amended and an amendment to it is in order first, or the Senate committee amendment may be amended if there is no motion made to amend the House provision. That is the purpose of the rule.

Mr. FESS. Being in the order of striking out and inserting, it can not be divided; otherwise, it would be an easy matter to take care of it. If the Senate votes affirmatively to strike out and insert, it would be the Senate committee provision that would be adopted. If it votes negatively, that would mean both have failed and the part that is reserved would be the House provision. Then it would be in order to move to strike out the House provision.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Chair then hold that the motion I made is not in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me suggest that by unanimous consent the motion to strike out and insert may be divided. That could be done by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then we would vote on the motion to insert first and on the motion to strike out afterwards.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not understand that the request was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that all Senators want to be fair about this matter and want to give each Senator an opportunity to vote his sentiments, both as to the rate and as to whether there should be any tax at all. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that after the vote is taken upon the amendment it shall be in order to move to strike out paragraph (4), regardless of whether the committee amendment is agreed to or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, only yesterday I announced that he was a poor sportsman who changed the rules in the middle of the game. Let the rules of the Senate apply in this case now as they have uniformly for a score or more of years. Now all of a sudden an effort is made to secure unanimous consent to alter the rules of the Senate, although the proponents of the tariff proposal are not to blame and have done nothing to bring about the parliamentary tangle, if there be one. All we ask is that the Senate proceed under its well-known and usually applied rules.

Why is it necessary now by unanimous consent to have a new rule, in order that Senators, forsooth, may obtain what they believe is an advantage? We, I say, scorn a parliamentary victory obtained by a trick, but we should be lashed from the temple of justice if we should consent that the rules shall be changed to our harm in the middle of the game. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a motion. I understand the Senator from Arizona objected to my request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona objected to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHURST. Respectfully, I objected.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "one-half cent" and inserting in lieu thereof "one-twentieth of 1 cent."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. That is in line 3, on page 243, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. It is in line 3, on page 243.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi. I am perfectly willing that he should proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I will follow the Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee. All in favor of the amendment——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was trying to get recognition before the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we might just as well take this question up now on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as to do it later, because what the Senator from Nebraska has moved to do is to strike out any relief for the oil fraternity of the United States; that is what the amendment amounts to. In other words, the Senator, with a very thorough knowledge of the rules of the Senate, has brought to a head the issue whether or not we are going to disregard all relief that is proposed by the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator frankly that I am opposed to any tariff on oil, and the Senator has correctly stated my position when he says the object of the amendment offered by me is to prevent any tariff on oil. I frankly concede that that is what I have in view, and under the ruling of the Chair it is going to be, as I see it, the only opportunity to test that question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LONG. Not while I have the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. I would only do it with the Senator's permission; I am not trying to take him off the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rules the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska may be amended.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me long enough to enable me to make such a motion, which will not change the situation?

Mr. LONG. Very well, I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to offer a substitute by inserting in place of one-twentieth of 1 cent which would be 4 mills or 5 mills——

Mr. LONG. It would be one-half a mill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; my mathematics was inaccurate for the moment. That is a little lower than the rate I had in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in order to make it perfectly clear, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of changing my amendment?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I will change it and move to strike out "one-half cent" and insert in lieu thereof "one-fourth mill."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is frivolous, and is not made in good faith.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not frivolous, and it is made in good faith.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has said that he does not believe in any kind of a tariff on oil.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yet he is pretending before the Senate to be in favor of a tariff of a quarter of a mill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if this is an effort to strike one Mills out of this whole bill. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is in order, and the Senator from Louisiana has been recognized.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as ridiculous as the amendment may appear, it is, nevertheless, a very frank and honest effort on the part of the Senator from Nebraska to have no tariff on oil.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. LONG. There are Senators who might have objected to that characterization of the amendment, but I am glad it does not offend my friend from Nebraska.

I had gone to the office of the Senator from Nebraska the other day to discuss a number of topics with him, and I had intended to discuss with him this matter; but I believed that it probably might be more effective to have an open, frank discussion here in the Senate on this oil tax than to undertake to discuss it at a time when there would be no one else present to advance, if there are any, arguments to the contrary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator yield for a moment that I may make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would not a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A substitute would be in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. I offer the following as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska it is proposed to strike out "one-half cent" and insert "1 cent," and in line 6, page 243 of the bill, it is proposed to strike out "one-half cent" and insert "1 cent"; in line 7, to strike out "2½" and insert "3"; and in line 8 to strike out "4" and insert "2."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not a substitute for the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except for the first rate named, it is not a substitute for the pending amendment, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CONNALLY. I offer as a substitute to strike out "one-half" and insert "one."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas in the nature of a substitute to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Nebraska has changed his proposed amendment providing a rate of one-twentieth of a cent to one-fourth of a mill, so that the Senator from Texas can amend his substitute so as to cover that point. So now we are debating the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas to determine whether we will amend the amendment that the Senator from Nebraska has offered to the pending amendment of the Senate Finance Committee amending the House bill.

Mr. President, perhaps the Senator from Texas would like to discuss his amendment first, if he thinks that is necessary, because that is now the question we are fixing to discuss. So I will be glad to yield the floor to him in order that he may discuss his amendment, if he prefers, in that order, because it is now his amendment which we are discussing.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator I expect to discuss it briefly.

Mr. LONG. The Senator can take his time; he does not need to be in any hurry so far as I am concerned. I yield the floor to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President and Senators, this is a bill to raise revenue. The House of Representatives under the Constitution is charged with the duty of originating revenue measures. In the performance of that duty, the House has sent to us a bill which carries an excise tax on imports of petroleum and petroleum products at the rate of 1 cent per gallon, or 42 cents per barrel. The Senate committee, in passing upon the matter, modified the rate and provided for an import tax of one-half cent per gallon on crude petroleum, one-half cent on fuel oil, 2½ cents per gallon on gasoline, and 4 cents on lubricating oil.

Mr. President, it will be urged that this is not a revenue-producing tax. I want to submit briefly the facts. In 1930 we imported into the United States 105,618,000 barrels of crude petroleum or petroleum products. In 1931 in the oil-producing sections of the country there was such a large production of oil that by law various States of the Union had to limit production in order to prevent waste of these great natural resources, and because of that program the States of Oklahoma and Texas put their oil fields under martial law in order to control and to reduce production. However, in face of that fact, in 1931, there were imported into the United States 86,000,000 barrels of oil or oil products, chiefly from Central and South America.

Mr. President, I want Senators who are so sensitive about the mention of the word "tariff" to listen to me. This matter has been exhaustively considered by the Tariff Commission, and the Tariff Commission reports that there is a differential of $1.03 per barrel between the production cost of mid-continent oil and foreign oil when delivered on the Atlantic seaboard.

So, Mr. President, let me remind those who are talking about this item being a tariff item that the full 1-cent rate would be only 42 cents a barrel excise duty at the customhouse, against $1.03 difference in cost of production. Therefore, there is no reason on earth why every barrel of oil that these producers desire to bring into the United States should not be still brought into the United States; and, if that be true, this particular item will produce from thirty to forty million dollars revenue for the Treasury.

Oh, but some gentlemen say, the Department of Commerce has estimated that the revenue would be only $5,000,000. The Treasury Department is not for this tax. The Treasury Department would make no estimates on this tax. They told the Finance Committee that they took the figures from the Department of Commerce. No; the Department of the Treasury is not for this tax, because Mr. Mellon's Gulf Oil Co. is one of the largest importers of foreign oil; and Mr. Mellon and all of his immediate group have fought an excise tax on imported crude petroleum and its products for years.

It is said that this item will produce only $5,000,000. If it produces $5,000,000, that is proof of the fact that some oil will come in. If some oil will come in, why will not more oil come in? If it will admit a single barrel of oil, why should it not admit two barrels, or three barrels, or many millions of barrels?

Mr. President, the estimates in this case have not been fairly made, and they do not reflect the facts.

Let me suggest to Members of the Senate that our domestic petroleum product already bears a heavy domestic tax, while imported petroleum comes in without paying a single cent toward the support of the Government of the United States.

In my State, and in other States where oil is produced, the moment the oil reaches the surface of the earth the State takes a production tax from it. It taxes the gross production of the well. That tax goes into the State's income. Foreign oil comes into the United States without paying a cent of that production tax; and unless we levy an excise tax on foreign oil at the customhouse, we are not only not helping the domestic oil producer but we are penalizing him, because we are permitting the foreigner to bring in his oil and sell it in our markets while we are taxing the domestic producer for the privilege of bringing the oil from the bowels of the earth to its surface.

Let me call attention, Mr. President, that this bill carries a tax on pipe lines. This bill provides that any shipper of oil who transports it through a pipe line must pay a certain percentage of the cost of transportation to the Federal Government. That is a Federal tax, not on the great oil company but on the privilege of transporting the oil, a tax to be paid by the producer of oil.

This bill taxes an oil producer for the mere privilege of sending his oil through a pipe line. That is a Federal tax; and unless we adopt an excise tax on imports, we are permitting the man yonder in Central and South America to bring his oil here in a tanker and sell it to our citizens without contributing one cent to the Federal income. Without an excise tax on crude petroleum and its products in this bill, the policy of our States and our Government is to penalize the domestic oil producer and to give a premium to the foreign producer of oil.

Who are these foreign producers of oil? In the case of ordinary imports it might be said that any merchant could be an importer. Any one could buy from foreign manufacturers. There might be thousands of such importers throughout the United States. When it comes to the importation of oil and petroleum products, however, who are the importers? There are only four. Of course there might be some isolated additional instances; but, generally speaking, there are only four. Who are they?

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana owns the Pan-American Petroleum Co. The Pan-American Petroleum Co. was the one great oil company that came before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and before the Finance Committee of the Senate and opposed the levy of any sort of an excise tax on foreign oil. The Pan-American Petroleum Co., a branch of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, is fighting this tax tooth and nail.

Who are the others?

The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey is another importer. It is opposing this tax.

Who are the others?

The third is the Dutch Shell Oil Corporation.

The fourth is the Gulf Petroleum Co., Mr. Mellon's company.

So there are four reasons, among others, against this tax. The first is the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey. The second is the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana. The third is the Dutch Shell Co. The fourth is the Mellon group, known as the Gulf Oil Co.

Mr. President, it may be said, and no doubt will be said, that this is a tariff item, and that Senators on this side of the aisle can not consistently vote for anything in the way of a tax on anything at the customhouse.

Mr. President, the Democratic view of the tariff from the earliest times has been that the chief object of levying duties at the customhouse was to secure revenue and that protection was incidental. On the other hand, the Republican doctrine has been that the primary purpose of levying duties at the customhouse was to secure protection, and that the revenue was incidental. This is a revenue bill. It is avowed that we want to search out all of the available sources of revenue in order that we may balance the Budget. I offer Members of the Senate a source of revenue which I confidently believe would produce $30,000,000 annually; and I want to suggest to Senators that the real question here is whether that $30,000,000 shall go into the Treasury of the United States or whether it shall go into the treasuries of the great oil companies that are importing their own oil.

If this tax is levied its result will be simply to decrease the profits of the four great oil corporations. It will not shut out the oil, because we are levying a tax of only 42 cents, whereas the Tariff Commission says that the average difference in cost of production is $1.03. The great bulk of that oil will still come into the United States and be refined here. The only difference will be that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Mellon group, and the Dutch Shell will receive about $30,000,000 less profit than they have been receiving.

Let us see whether or not that is a fair statement.

Let me remind Senators that all of the other oil producers in the United States except these four great companies have to produce domestic oil, and with that domestic oil they compete with the very four companies which I am describing. The fact that these foreign companies can bring in their oil tax free when domestic companies are being taxed by State, county, and Nation gives these four great monopolistic concerns the power to break the market of domestic oil and ruin the independent producer and the small producer whenever they may desire. That was illustrated last year. In 1931, when Texas had troops in the oil fields to control production, when Oklahoma had the militia in the oil fields to shut down production, when my State was appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the State treasury to regulate production and to shut down the wells so that they would not drown us in oil, the four great companies owning foreign oil brought in tremendous supplies of tax-free foreign oil and added to our distress and added to the burdens which our States were bearing.

Is it fair? Is it fair to the Texas Co., is it fair to any other great oil company, to force it to compete here in America for our markets and give a premium to these four domestic corporations? The other companies have to use domestic oil. They have to pay State, county, municipal, and Federal taxes on their property. The only difference will be that every dollar that will go into the Treasury under this bill will go into the profits of these four great oil companies unless the bill includes an excise tax of this kind.

Mr. President, I know that Senators are anxious to proceed with the bill. I could consume the rest of the afternoon if I should undertake to quote to the Senate statistics and data with reference to imports and with reference to domestic conditions in the oil fields. Let me remind, Senators, however, that to-day, even as we are sitting here, in my State our citizens, under the lash of the law, have had their oil wells choked down until, though you may have an oil well capable of producing 10,000 barrels a day, under our law you can produce only 67 barrels from an individual well. Sixty-seven barrels a day is all that my State will allow you to produce, though you may have a potential production of thousands. Our citizens are forced to take that action not because they wish it but because the law forces them to take it; and yet has the Federal Government no sympathy with our people? Is it unwilling to aid? On the other hand, is the Federal Government going to insist that to our difficulties shall be added this flood of foreign oil from Venezuela and Central and South America, brought here not for the purpose of giving our domestic consumers lower prices—no—brought here for the purpose of enriching these four corporations; brought here for the purpose of affording them a club whereby they can beat down the small independent producer; and, once securing an absolute monopoly of the oil business, they will then fix their prices on gasoline and other products at such a figure as may satisfy their greed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. When the question of rates upon oil was pending in connection with the Smoot-Hawley bill, many of us opposed the proposed rates on the theory that there was such insufficient regulation and proration at home that the net value would be negligible, if anything. I want to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that in the interim that phase of oil-production regulation has been drastic in the United States and that that objection now has substantially disappeared?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that he is quite correct. Conditions have wholly changed in the matter of production since those items were before the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. President, I make bold to state that measures which have been adopted in Oklahoma and Texas with reference to the control of oil would not have been tolerated by any free people with regard to any other right which they possessed. If the strong arm of the military had been employed to suppress free speech, the people would have rebelled. If it had been employed to take their private property away from them, they would have risen up in riot. But they submitted because of the dire necessities of the case. It was either submit or absolutely perish and be drowned in a flood of domestic oil.

Yet, with our States in these conditions of distress, with the oil-producing States going through these terrible times, oppressed and distressed, the United States Government, instead of expressing sympathy for them, instead of lending its aid, has been refusing to place a single dollar of tax upon the importers, and their flood of foreign oil has increased our misery and subtracted from our wealth and from the orderly production of our oil.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan also brought out very clearly the fact that two years ago many Senators would not vote for the rates which were then proposed because they thought that they would shut out imports. Let me remind the Senator that we are not now asking in this bill 2 cents per gallon. That would be, in effect, with some grades of oil, probably prohibitive; the oil might not be brought in. But with a tax of only 42 cents a barrel, and with the report of the Tariff Commission of a differential of $1.03 per barrel, I submit that this is not a protective tax; I submit that it is a revenue tax.

Do Senators suppose that the great Gulf Oil Co. will cease to bring its own oil to its own refineries here in the United States when it can do so $1.03 a barrel more cheaply than it can buy domestic oil, because of the payment of a tax of 42 cents? Do Senators suppose that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana will forego their opportunity to make 61 cents a barrel by bringing their own oil into our markets?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any estimate as to how much revenue we would collect by reason of this proposed rate on oil?

Mr. CONNALLY. The only estimate I know anything about, except private estimates, is that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, when before the Finance Committee, said that the Treasury had made no estimate, but that it had taken an estimate which had been made some time before by the Department of Commerce, and that the estimate was that it would produce $5,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Was any estimate made with reference to copper?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not recall that. I do not know what that estimate was. Probably the Senator from Michigan can answer that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Treasury has never made an estimate in connection with copper. Those statisticians upon whom we have been relying for information, which has proven itself to be accurate, have estimated an ultimate $10,000,000 a year from the copper rate. But let me repeat that that is ultimate, because of the existing stock on hand, and I suppose it would be safer to say that the current revenue would probably not exceed $5,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have in my hand figures as to importation of crude oil during the years 1929, 1930, and 1931, prepared by the Tariff Commission in a supplementary report. Based on these figures, the importations of crude oil on the average for the years 1929, 1930, and 1931 were 2,636,367,888 gallons, which at half a cent would yield $13,181,839.

Mr. BORAH. Thirteen million?

Mr. SMOOT. Thirteen million.

Mr. BORAH. Is that from the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. It is based on the Tariff Commission supplementary report. Then, as to fuel and gas oil, the estimate is 5,013,671,000 gallons.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the total from all petroleum products?

Mr. SMOOT. The estimate is $31,979,245.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is from the Tariff Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the Tariff Commission's estimate.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to have that. It is a supplementary report, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, only recently sent up.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. I understand that he just stated that the yield would be $21,000,000 on a rate of half a cent per gallon. I want to know whether that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. As to fuel and gas oil?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. All sorts of imports—crude, fuel oil, and gasoline—at half a cent per gallon, would yield $21,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is on the imports. The report says:

Imports of petroleum, based on the average for three years, 1929, 1930, and 1931, taken from the United States Tarfiff Commission's supplementary report.

Crude oil, 2,636,367,888 gallons, at a half a cent, $13,181,839. Then for fuel and gas oil, 1,002,734,334 gallons, at a half a cent, $5,013,671. Then as to gasoline and other like products, 551,349,414 gallons, at 2½ cents, $13,783,785.

Mr. BORAH. That is based on the assumption that the same amount of oil will come in after this tariff is levied.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. That is a very unsatisfactory estimate, in my judgment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the figures which have now been presented justify the statements which I made earlier in my remarks, that the Treasury and its supposed estimates were unfriendly, and that they did not reflect the real facts.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the junior Senator from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In reference to the remark of the Senator from Idaho that we could not expect imports to be as large after the tariff is levied as they were before, let me suggest that even if the imports should fall off 50 per cent, under this estimate we would have collected about $15,000,000 in revenue during the 3-year period 1929, 1930, and 1931.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. As was well suggested by my colleague, if imports should decline 50 per cent, we would still receive $15,000,000 additional revenue.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that any considerable import tax, of course, has a tendency to decrease imports. But the facts still are that at least three of these great companies have their refining establishments in the United States, their home offices in the United States, and it is to their interest and their profit to bring the oil here and refine it here, rather than build and establish new refineries in Central and South America.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED. I am disturbed by the Senator's amendment, because the immediate effect of it would be to make the tax on crude oil 1 cent, and the tax on fuel oil would remain at half a cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. I offered it all the way along.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator did.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that for the present I shall withdraw my amendment.

Mr. REED. I am very glad of that, because I do not want to get us put into the position of voting against a tariff in which we believe, merely because it is out of line with the other tariffs.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that when I offered the amendment I intended it as a substitute entirely for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, but the Chair held that it was only in part a substitute and ruled out the remainder.

Mr. REED. I heard that ruling. I knew the Senator meant it quite in accordance with our understanding.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that at the conclusion of my remarks I shall withdraw my amendment.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There are two propositions which naturally one considers in regard to a matter like this. The first is the question of revenue and the second is the question of protection.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that some statistician, some expert, testified before the committee that the revenue from the tariff on oil and coal and copper and lumber, all combined, would amount to about six or seven million dollars.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; there was no expert before the committee except the Secretary of the Treasury, as I recall it. Most of those on the committee and others opposed to these duties poke fun at the idea of their bringing in any revenue, but there was never presented any real estimate until the Senator from Utah produced the one from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the report of the committee shows that the oil tariff is estimated by the Treasury to yield $5,000,000 a year; the coal tariff, $500,000; the lumber tariff, $1,000,000. There is no estimate as to copper.

Mr. BORAH. There is no copper coming in, is there?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; there is a lot of copper coming in from Canada. Some 30,000,000 tons, as I recall it, came in last year.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Pennsylvania to contradict what I said by quoting the report of the committee. I said the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before our committee and stated the Treasury itself had made no estimate but had borrowed the $5,000,000 estimate from the Department of Commerce. Is not that correct?

Mr. REED. I think that is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. So the only real estimate, I shall say to the Senator from Idaho, that has been made at the request of the Finance Committee is the estimate which the Senator from Utah has exhibited.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want one observation made by the Senator from Idaho to stand without correction. He intimated by his inquiry that he thought no copper was coming into the United States at the present time, and I want to call his attention to the fact that, at the rate of importation during the last three months, the total importations for this year will be 428,000 tons, which will be the largest figure in the history of copper importations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am pleased to have that information.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the estimates made by the Tariff Commission are certainly entitled to weight and consideration. The Tariff Commission is better equipped than even the Treasury Department with reference to estimates on imports and exports. So I am glad that the Senator from Utah has submitted the estimates made by the Tariff Commission.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to sum up what I have undertaken to point out to the Senate.

In the first place, this is a revenue bill; and the excise tax on petroleum is a revenue producer and will bring in quite a number of millions of dollars.

In the second place, the domestic petroleum producers are heavily taxed in the States. They are taxed in this bill on the transportation of oil; and unless we levy a tax on imports for the purpose of equalizing competition in some degree, we are going to do the domestic-oil producer a great injustice and visit upon him a great wrong.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. My information is that in most of the States, if not in all of them, there is what is called a production tax, called in some States a severance tax; but whatever it is called it is levied on the production of crude oil, and the same applies to gas and sulphur and coal, and in many States to other mineral products.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the average tax levied by the States which produce oil, by whatever name it may be known?

Mr. CONNALLY. The rates vary from 2 to 2½ and 3 per cent in some of the States.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator would not be able to say, then, on the average what this production tax may be, but in the States it is a percentage based on the sale value of the product when it comes out of the ground.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct. It is based on the value of the oil at the moment it reaches the surface of the earth. In many of the States it is either 2 or 2½ per cent. I believe it is 3 per cent in Oklahoma.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is 1½ per cent in my State. I believe the general average would be about 2 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would judge so.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a State tax, and the revenue goes to the payment of the expenses of State government, but it is a contribution made by this product to government in one form or another.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I understand the Senator's position, it is that oil brought into this country does not pay that tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not.

Mr. BARKLEY. And in that respect has a decided advantage over domestic oil?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true. In addition, this very bill which we are now considering taxes the oil producer on his right to transport oil through a pipe line. That tax must be paid by the producer for the privilege of shipping.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that would apply to the imported oil as well as the domestic oil.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the imported oils are not shipped by pipe line. They are unloaded along the Atlantic coast and are consumed there. Of course, if they should be transported by pipe lines, foreign oils would pay that tax as well; but as a matter of fact, the foreign oils are not transported by pipe line. They are landed at Atlantic ports and refined and consumed in those very areas.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The answer the Senator made a moment ago is not exactly correct. I have an analysis of that matter. In some States the tax is as high as 11 cents per barrel on the high grades. At this time some of that oil is selling for less than 75 cents a barrel and paying 11 cents severance tax in some States, so it goes away above the figure stated. In some instances it is as high as 16⅔ per cent at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. I undertook to say it varied in the various States. I did not undertake to cover the whole field accurately and in detail.

Irrespective of the rate, the point I am undertaking to make is that the domestic oil and the domestic producers of oil are heavily taxed in all of the States, while the foreign producers of oil are not. I have statistics available, which I shall not bring to the attention of the Senate at this time, showing the proportion of ad valorem taxes, the ad valorem taxes which the oil producers in America pay toward the State governments, ad valorem taxes on their land, on their oil wells, on their refineries, on their pipe lines, and on every other character of personal and real property which those concerns own. It is a very substantial sum in every State in which there is oil development. The four importing oil corporations pay negligible taxes and negligible burdens in the South American countries where they produce the oil.

Mr. President, let me remind the Senate again that the United States Tariff Commission, set up by this Government for the purpose of ascertaining the differences in domestic and foreign costs, has issued valuable information on those questions. I hold in my hand a supplemental report under date of September 1, 1931. Here is what the Tariff Commission then said:

In contrast with the situation for the Nation as a whole, the State of Texas produced some 331,700,000 barrels in 1931, or 39 per cent of the national total. That is to say, about 35,000,000 barrels more than the State produced in 1929 and over 41,000,000 barrels more than in 1930. The production of the fields of east Texas in 1931, practically all of which was new production, was nearly 108,000,000 barrels. This increase is significant when compared with the total imports of crude and refined oil from foreign sources, which aggregated some 86,000,000 barrels of foreign oil.

In other words, wherever we have an increase in domestic production in our State or in any other State of the Nation it is offset immediately by the foreign oil which those producers bring into the United States and sell in competition. The report of the Tariff Commission also sets forth the difference in the cost of production as being in most grades $1.09.

Mr. President, it is not my desire to discuss the matter at great length. I submit it with these three propositions:

The excise tax is a revenue measure. The official estimates of the Tariff Commission show that we will get $30,000,000. Is that correct, may I ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. We would have gotten that much in 1929, 1930, and 1931 for the three years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that an insignificant sum? Is that a sum which Senators consider of no consequence?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That estimate was based on a rate of one-half cent. If the rate had been 1 cent, the revenue for the three years would have been $50,000,000 on crude petroleum and its products.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank my colleague. The estimate which the Tariff Commission submits is on the basis of one-half cent a gallon. On the basis of 1 cent a gallon the revenue for three years would be an average of $30,000,000. Is $30,000,000 annually insignificant? It will not be a prohibitory tariff. It will be a revenue duty. It will help fill the deficit in the Treasury. The refusal of the Senate to vote for an excise tax on foreign oil will benefit only four concerns—the two Standard Oil companies, the Royal Dutch Shell, and Mr. Mellon. Mr. Mellon may not need the money, but it will benefit those four companies, and I do not believe it will benefit anybody else.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. To what extent will it benefit the consumer of oil?

Mr. CONNALLY. It will benefit the consumer by allowing to live the independent oil companies, the independent producers, who are the real competitors of these gigantic oil corporations. Unless these independents do live, unless the competitors of these four great concerns are allowed to live, God help the consumer when the independents have been smothered and strangled, because we shall then be at the mercy of the great oil companies and they will fix the price they desire for gasoline. I am told that in the Republic of Colombia, where oil is produced, they pay for gasoline three times as much as we pay in the United States, because it is controlled there by a monopoly.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is going to be frank enough, of course, as he has been in the past, to admit that this tariff on imported oil is going to raise the price of oil. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer when the Senator concludes.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we can get that settled I would like to ask the Senator another question. Is that true?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to be catechised back and forth. I would like to have the Senator ask his question and let me answer it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask the Senator that question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then I shall answer the Senator. Of course, it will have a tendency to increase the price of crude oil for the reason that these companies, if they pay 42 cents in the form of a tax to bring the oil in here, will not want to lose any money. But that does not mean that the consumer will pay more for gasoline, for the simple reason that the competitor, the Texas Co., for illustration, which to-day buys domestic oil, manufactures that oil into gasoline, and competes with Mr. Mellon's Gulf Oil Co., sells its gasoline at exactly the same price. But the difference is that Mr. Mellon's oil company, because it can bring in free oil makes more profit on the oil than the Texas Co. does. The only difference will be that instead of the money going into the treasury of Mellon and the Standard Oil Co., a portion of it will go into the Treasury of the United States, and we shall have a more fair competition because the companies will all be more nearly on the same basis, and their raw products will come more nearly costing each one of them the same.

Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator handled it pretty well from his viewpoint; but if he will permit me, I think that putting a tariff on the product tends to raise the price.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said so.

Mr. TYDINGS. That being so, whatever the independent oil companies will profit will, of course, come out of the pockets of those who consume the oil. In addition to that, three-quarters of one year's supply of the Nation's oil is already in the pipe lines of the big oil companies, so they will overnight add about 2 cents a gallon on every gallon of oil they have stored.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, the Senator seems to know what they are doing. I do not know, but let me ask the Senator a question. In Maryland had he rather buy oil from Oklahoma or buy it from Venezuela if it cost the same price?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course we would rather buy it from Oklahoma.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right; let us see if you had. Down in Oklahoma right now there is plenty of oil which the owners want to produce. They want to bring it out of the ground. They want to sell it to the consumers in the Senator's State and mine, but the law will not let them sell it because, it is said, they are going to overproduce and it is going to be wasted. As a result, instead of buying identical oil from Oklahoma the Senator buys from South and Central America, whereas if we had a reasonable tax on the right to import that foreign oil, so as to make the foreign company pay a part of the burden of government, he could then buy the oil from Oklahoma, in the form of gasoline, without it costing him one cent more.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator said a moment ago that the tariff would tend to increase the price of the oil.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of the crude oil; yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Therefore may I say to the Senator that the people of my State would have to pay more for their oil than we pay now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Do the Senator's people consume crude oil?

Mr. TYDINGS. We take it into Maryland and convert it into gasoline.

Mr. CONNALLY. Who does that?

Mr. TYDINGS. The oil companies.

Mr. CONNALLY. The big oil companies?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Pan-American Oil Co.; yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana does that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Regardless of who does it, the Senator has admitted that we get it more cheaply.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I have not.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator said the duty would increase the price.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said it would tend to increase the price of crude oil which is brought here, which it would.

Mr. TYDINGS. It would actually increase the cost of gasoline if it is made from more expensive crude oil.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not necessarily. Let me ask the Senator if he believes in a tariff for revenue?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have 500 tariff amendments here; if the Senator wants to raise more revenue he can vote for them.

Mr. CONNALLY. But does the Senator favor a tariff law?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will let me answer his question, I will say—and I think the Senator will agree to the statement—that the tariff as now written penalizes the people of his State, and I have 500 amendments to reduce the tariff so that we can put his State on an equality with the rest of the country.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me to propound a question to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer the Senator, and then I shall yield. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland, for whom I have a very high personal regard——

Mr. TYDINGS. And that feeling is reciprocated.

Mr. CONNALLY. That he believes in a tariff for revenue on other commodities, but he does not believe in a tariff on oil, because there are no oil wells in Maryland, but there are oil companies in Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that I do not think this tariff proposal has any place in this internal revenue bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it did have a place here, would the Senator be for it?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will bring before us a tariff bill I will be very glad, in my individual capacity, to debate it with him and discuss it from every angle, and, if he can make out a case, to support it; but I do not think that we want to go into it now. To prove my statement, let me say that there are advocates here of a tariff on wood pulp, on phosphate, on manganese, on steel, on copper and its translated products, and on a variety of other commodities. Obviously, I do not think that oil ought to have any special privilege. If we are going to take up the whole tariff law and give any of these commodities a run for their money, that is one thing; but I do not think that it is right to pick out two or three, no matter how aggravated the situation affecting them may be, and give them special consideration.

Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, and Mr. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield first to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I wish to make this observation: Conceding the situation to be such as it is in the oil industry, with the four largest companies in the world operating here, and with filling stations at almost every corner, is it reasonable to assume that the companies that buy oil more cheaply in foreign countries will cut down their prices when their only competitors are independent corporations that must get out of the business by way of profit sufficient to justify them to remain in it? The result is that the Treasury loses that money and the consumer does not save a copper cent.

Mr. COUZENS. And the four oil companies gain it in the form of profits.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The four oil companies just scoop it up and are in better position to crush any competition that comes up. The result is that in every town one visits, small or large, he will find when one of the independent companies establishes a filling station that the large corporations go there and establish one across the street, until we have such stations at almost every corner.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And the company that can get imported oil $1.03 cheaper is not giving that benefit to the people at all but is taking it itself.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And it may reduce the price sufficiently to put the other fellow out of business sometimes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Louisiana because he has made a very substantial contribution to this debate. The four companies that are importers of oil, when they can bring it here for $1.03 a barrel less than the cost to their domestic competitors, are not going to give the consumer the value of that $1.03, because if they should do so they would be on a level with their competitors; and, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, with four or five other great competitors selling gasoline, who must sell it at a level in order to stay in the business, that fact enables the four great companies to put the particular money that they save in their pockets as profit. The only difference will be that under this amendment a part of it will go into the Treasury of the United States instead of into the treasuries of the four oil companies.

Now, I should like to reply to the Senator from Maryland for a moment. The Senator from Maryland says that he has ready 500 amendments proposing to lower tariff duties. Well, if we lower a duty it means that we are still going to retain a duty; if we lower a duty it means we are still going to levy some kind of a tariff. So the Senator from Maryland is in favor of levying a tariff on at least 500 items, but is not in favor of levying a single cent of excise tax on oil. Why should we discriminate against oil?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I went to some little trouble to point out to the Senator that, in my judgment, this is not a tariff bill and that it ought not to have tariff items in it. I only suggested that if we are going to take up the tariff we ought to take up the whole tariff so as to treat each product with the same amount of consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh!

Mr. TYDINGS. Now the Senator's plan is to take only four products, when others may be equally deserving of additional duties or lower duties, as the case may be, and exclude them entirely, so that the products of his community are the only ones that are to receive consideration, except in one or two other instances, in the whole tariff matter. Yet this is a revenue bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I would be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, this is a revenue-raising measure, is it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator was a protectionist; I did not know he was an advocate of a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am for protection also.

Mr. TYDINGS. I knew the Senator was.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So was George Washington.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no quarrel with the Senator; he is perfectly within his rights.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. George Washington signed the first protective tariff bill on July 4, 1789, as a patriotic act.

Mr. TYDINGS. But this is not a tariff bill, I want to say to the Senator; and, while I respect his view, when I see him for these tariff items I know that it is just another protective tariff measure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the tariff at this point, but, with great candor, and not to embarrass anybody here or elsewhere, it is not improper for me to recall that when this revenue-raising measure—not a tariff measure, but a revenue-raising measure—was under consideration by the Committee on Finance, I there again and again remarked that no Democratic Member would be embarrassed in the slightest in considering that some revenue could be derived on imports of oil or coal or copper or lumber, for they could stand and would be standing upon the true historic Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. Whether this bill be called a revenue bill or a tariff bill, the placing of some duty on oil, for example, will yield much-needed revenue to the Government; and no thoughtful, sincere, and regular Democratic Member should be in the slightest embarrassed when he takes the stand which has been taken, and now is held by the Senator from Texas, or as will be taken and held by the Senator from Arizona and by other upstanding, thoroughgoing and patriotic members of the Democratic Party. But I wish to emphasize the thought at this juncture that this is a revenue-raising measure and that we can get additional revenue by increasing income taxes or estate taxes or by placing a duty on certain imports.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland this afternoon, for which I voted, would have yielded revenue.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We are not confined to any given quarter for the raising of revenue. This is not a tariff bill—not at all—it is a revenue-raising measure. I beg pardon for detaining the Senate. I merely wish to add that I support these items—these so-called tariff items—first, because they are revenue-raising items; and, moreover, I am hopeful that they will afford some protection to American industry, whether it be on the farm, in the mine, or in the shop. I am for America and for American industries first, last, and all the time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Later on, in my own time, I think I can convince the Senator that the provision pending is a revenue-raising measure; but it will raise revenue from the consumers of oil and put the revenue in the pockets of the large oil companies, because they dominate the oil fields; and what is now being asked is that they may be put in a position to exact further toll from the consumers of oil all over the country. I think I can almost prove that with the facts I have if I have any audience to listen to me.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I beg pardon of the Senator from Texas for having taken so much of his time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me observe here, in reply to the Senator from Maryland, and in connection with what the Senator from California has said, that until we adopted the internal-revenue income tax in 1913 all our tariff bills were revenue bills, because that was how we raised the revenue for the Government. Every tariff bill was a revenue bill designed to get the money with which to run this Government. Because in 1913 we adopted the income tax as a further means of raising revenue it did not change the fact at all that every tariff bill that is brought into this Chamber is brought in as a revenue producer. The only authority which Congress possesses to levy any tariff duties at all is because of the constitutional grant to Congress which provides that Congress shall have the power to raise revenue, and the tariff is incidental to the raising of revenue. If we did not raise revenue in a tariff bill, we would have no constitutional warrant whatever for passing that kind of a bill.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I must yield first to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in tariff bills we have at different times included strictly revenue-raising provisions, and vice versa. For instance, the corporation tax was first imposed by section 38 of the tariff act of 1909; the corporation tax was placed in that bill. Then, in the act of 1913, an income tax was first imposed by section 2 of the tariff act of 1913.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why, certainly. Let me say to the Senator that the first income tax bill we have had since the war was passed in 1894, and was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It was contained in the Democratic tariff act of 1894. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland that that was a tariff act in which a distinguished Senator from his own State, Senator Gorman, had a very important and a very potent part; and that is the authority I now give to the Senator from Maryland—the fact that Senator Gorman's tariff bill of 1894 carried an income-tax provision. I have it here before me.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Democratic tariff act of 1913.

Mr. CONNALLY. And the Democratic tariff act of 1913, with which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is fully familiar, because I understand that he had a large part in drafting the income tax of 1913, which is carried in the Underwood Tariff Act of that year. Why was it so carried? It was carried because it was a revenue producer, and it was put in a revenue bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL. The Treasury was willing to back up those acts as real, substantial, revenue-producing acts, whereas in this instance neither the Senator from Tennessee nor his colleagues were willing to report out this bill over their signatures with an estimate of but $500,000 for coal and a trivial amount for oil. That is the difference between a substantial, tangible, permanent, revenue-producing proposition, such as the 2 per cent tax on all income of corporations and individuals in the act of 1894, and the 1 per cent excise on corporations to supplement the tariff revenues of the tariff act of 1909, and the graduated rates on individuals and the substantial rates on corporations, which were part and parcel of the almost purely revenue-producing act of 1913.

Since the Senator has personally mentioned me, I want to contrast the good faith that attached to the conduct of the Congress when those really revenue-producing acts were enacted and this pure burlesque and travesty on a revenue measure which the Senator is undertaking to dignify as belonging to the same class.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon for mentioning his name in the discussion. I did so in a complimentary manner. I said that the Senator from Tennessee had a very large part in framing that act.

Mr. HULL. I certainly would not want an income tax that raised $15,000,000 during the war to be placed in the same class with this oil tariff which is called a tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Tennessee suggests that the estimates for the oil revenue are trifling. The Senator from Utah holds in his hands estimates from the Tariff Commission which say that over a period of three years it will produce approximately $60,000,000 at 1 cent a gallon instead of half a cent a gallon. Does the Senator from Tennessee regard $60,000,000 as a trifling item?

Mr. HULL. I want to make up the record.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I presume the Senator from Utah has such faith in those estimates that he will be quite willing to strike out some of the excise taxes, which, on the basis of that estimate, I think I shall be impelled to propose later on in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply called the attention of the Senate to the fact that that is what happened.

Mr. GEORGE. I know; but I assume that the Senator from Utah has such faith in the revenue-producing quality and character of the oil tax and the other taxes imposed here that he will be quite willing to strike out some of the special excise taxes that are particularly burdensome upon other lines of business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah thinks that if this bill were passed just as it is it would not raise enough revenue to meet the deficit of our Government.

Mr. GEORGE. But the Senator knows that when we were considering the bill we estimated the revenue from this particular tariff at around $5,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. We did not do that. The Treasury did.

Mr. GEORGE. The Treasury did. So that if we were then mistaken, and we are going to get a much larger sum of money, I am happy to learn it, because we will be able to remove some excise taxes from the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall answer the Senator from Georgia. If the Senator from Georgia will join in and help us to secure the revenue of about $31,000,000 from this item, I am sure a number of us shall be glad to help him take out some of the excise taxes; but I do not think the Senator has any intention of doing that.

Mr. GEORGE. I am happy to learn, though, that we shall be able to do it; and I observe that the distinguished Senator from Utah is particularly gratified that the income from these tariffs is going to be very much greater than he first was informed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong on that. I said that they would not be as great as they were estimated to be.

Mr. HULL. Why did not the Senator insert that estimate in his report if he had faith in it?

Mr. CONNALLY. He did not have the estimate then.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any objection to the Senator referring to the committee report.

Mr. HULL. Why did the estimates stay at the Senator's desk instead of his inserting them in this report if they mean anything?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not think the estimates from the Tariff Commission were available when the Senator from Utah made his report.

Mr. GEORGE. That was the thing that made me so very happy—because now they are available, and the distinguished Senator from Utah has brought them upon the floor; and I am gratified to know that we are going to be able to eliminate some excise taxes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Tennessee are members of the Finance Committee. They know that we had no estimates from the Tariff Commission at the time the bill was reported. I hold in my hand now the estimates from the Tariff Commission, which were furnished the Senator from Utah. On the basis of these estimates it appears that a very substantial amount of revenue will be produced.

The Senator from Tennessee smiles. I do not know whether he means to impugn my sincerity or to draw some unfavorable inference as to these estimates. I do not know where they came from. The Senator from Utah says they came from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimate states plainly where it came from.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why, certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The figures are for the years 1929, 1930, and 1931, and they came from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. HULL. There is considerable doubt about where they did come from. I think we should have the Tariff Commission brought up here before the committee, and let us run these figures down, and see where they come from.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about where they come from.

Mr. CONNALLY. They sent them to the chairman of the committee. The Senator from Tennessee does the Senator from Utah an injustice, I am sure, in suggesting that there is doubt as to where they come from. The Senator from Utah has had custody of them. He turned them over to me a moment ago. If the Senator from Tennessee is doubtful as to the accuracy of them, he may very easily step into the cloakroom and call the Tariff Commission and check up on both the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Texas.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator from Texas the estimated revenue from the other tariff items in the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not.

Mr. GEORGE. Only as to oil?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is all I have.

Mr. GEORGE. I should be delighted to have the estimates as to all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. This estimate is not based upon what the revenue will be. They do not say how much oil will come into the United States if the tariff is imposed. These figures show what oil came into the country in the years stated; and if the same amount came into the country hereafter, and this rate was imposed, it would raise that amount of money. The Tariff Commission does not express any opinion as to what oil will come in if the rate is imposed.

Mr. GEORGE. I know that; but we have been assured that these are not embargo tariffs; that they are tariffs for revenue. If that is so the imports are still coming in; and I am delighted to know that the revenue is going to be greatly increased, so that it will enable us, for example, to relieve the automobile people to some extent.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I ask the Senator from Texas what difference it makes whether the provision brings $500,000 or $500,000,000 into the Treasury? Is it not a question of principle?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If we admit the principle that we can tax oil for $500,000, why can we not tax it for any amount that our judgment prompts us to put on it?

Mr. CONNALLY. Even the Department of Commerce made just a rough estimate; and it told the Finance Committee that according to their guess the provision would produce $5,000,000 a year. Five million dollars a year is a considerable revenue, even for the Federal Government.

Now, I want to say something with reference to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

I made a reference to the Senator from Tennessee by name, but I meant no improper reference. The Senator from Utah suggested that the income-tax provision of 1913 was carried in the Underwood Tariff Act. I then turned, the Senator from Tennessee being here, and said that the Senator from Tennessee had a large part in framing the income-tax provision of 1913. I hope the Senator did not conclude from that that I made any unkind reference; but he replied with some heat, apparently because I had mentioned his name.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I came in just as the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Texas were attempting to build up some precedent in support of the insertion of tariff items in a purely internal-revenue bill here upon the theory that they would be substantial revenue-yielding items. I felt that it was entirely unfair to those former acts, the revenue-producing qualities of which were large, and nobody questioned it, to use them to bolster up a proposal here which the Treasury itself refuses to get behind in any sense whatever; and the Secretary, when he was pressed before our committee as to the importance of this item as a revenue producer, said that he was not interested in car fare. That was the answer of the Secretary.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know what the Secretary said.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the Senator from Utah gave no estimate as to what revenue would be derived if these rates were put into the bill. All that the Senator from Utah did was this: He had here the estimates for the three years from the Tariff Commission. I never intended to bring up the matter at all, but the question arose; and as the Senator was speaking of it, I had the figures and I gave them to him.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I have no disposition to debate this matter except to the extent that it is urged as a reason why these tariff items should be brought into this emergency internal-revenue bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not my idea at all. I merely stated the facts in the case. The Senate is to decide whether or not the provision shall go in.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee said that when he entered the Chamber the Senator from Utah and I were trying to build up some precedent for combining a tariff bill and an income tax bill in the same measure. I shall say to the Senator from Utah that if anybody built up that precedent it was the Senator from Tennessee and not the Senators from Texas and Utah. I was not undertaking to build up any precedent. I was simply quoting the action of the Senator from Tennessee himself in 1913 in regard to the income tax law, with which he had a great deal to do and for which he received a great deal of distinction and reputation, of which I am proud. I called attention to the fact that that income tax law, upon which his reputation is largely built, was included in the tariff act of 1913. It was sound legislation in 1913 to have an income tax in a tariff bill, or to have revenue tariff items in a revenue bill. It was sound in 1913 when the Senator from Tennessee was building that legislation as a member of the Ways and Means Committee—both building the tariff and building the revenue. It was sound to put them in the same measure then because the Senator was for both of them. Now, when the Senator is not for an item, it is a crime and a sin for a Democrat to stand on the floor and offer the Senator's own precedent in justification for what we are trying to do here now, namely, to put a revenue item in a revenue bill.

Mr. HULL. Does the Senator expect to discuss the emergency condition over at the Treasury which involves the credit of the Government during the coming weeks, facing as we do a deficit running at the rate of two and three-quarter million dollars? If so, does not the Senator think that some of us at least could, without being criticized, object to the insertion in a wholly emergency tax measure for the relief of the Treasury of an indefinite number of promiscuous tariff items which do not particularly relate to the revenue?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says this is an emergency; that we had to have some money; that we had to have it quickly. When we show him how we can get somewhere from fifty to sixty million dollars in three years he says, "Oh, no; we will not have that, because that has something to do with the tariff." That is the Senator's attitude. The Senator will not even consider it, because he is afraid of the tariff phantom.

The question is whether or not it is a revenue producer. I hold in my hand the tariff act of 1913, a Democratic tariff act, for which the Senator from Tennessee voted. How many tariffs are there in it? This act levied tariff duties on hundreds of items, and it was not any crime for the Senator from Tennessee to vote for it because it was a revenue act. It was adopted for the purpose of raising revenue according to Democratic doctrine, and the Senator from Tennessee helped frame that act. And what does it provide? It is a tariff act, "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Texas wants to be fair.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do want to be fair.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to point out, however, that there is this distinction between the so-called precedent set by the Senator from Tennessee and the one now before the Senate. In the other measure every tariff item received consideration, the whole gamut of tariff legislation was considered, whereas in this bill only four items are selected, and the other items are excluded.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has a perfect right to offer any amendment to the revenue bill before us he cares to offer, if it will produce revenue.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is just the point. I have had very great pressure brought on me, and particularly in reference to wood pulp, but may I say to the Senator that if each of us offered such amendments, the Budget would never be balanced, the revenue would never come in, and the country would be gone before we could straighten it out.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is getting in an awful hurry. The Senator from Maryland is in a terrible hurry now. He consumed nearly all day here debating an item proposed to be inserted in this bill which he knew had no chance whatever of being adopted. But when we get to the subject of oil, the Senator does not favor an excise tax on oil, and he gets in a terrible hurry, and we have to vote to save the Government. And the Senator from Tennessee is in a tremendous hurry, too. If this bill is delayed, it is because of those who want to sidestep this issue.

I have no objection, if gentlemen are against this duty, to their voting against it, but let them not try to flank us by such a pretense as, "Oh, well, this has no place in the bill." Face the issue, whether it has a place in the bill or not. Do not try to sidetrack it. If Senators are against it, let them vote against it, and say they are against it, but let them not say, "Well, I might be for it, but this is the wrong place to put it." That does not go. Nobody believes that sort of statement. Nobody believes that either one of these Senators would vote for an excise tax on oil, no matter what kind of a bill it was in, because they are perfectly willing not to tax what their people consume, but probably would be willing to levy duties on what their people produce.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the debate on the so-called beer proposition was very short. At least it had the merit of being debated in a very short space of time and fought to a conclusion. I certainly did nothing to prolong it. Already we have taken up one day, with no prospect of a vote, on one single part of the tariff on oil, and the Senator has at least five other amendments dealing with this paragraph. So that if we consumed the same amount of time on the remaining amendments we have consumed on this amendment, it will take at least a week to act on the tariff on oil alone.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland that I should have concluded long ago but for the interruptions of himself and other Senators who were not in favor of the excise tax on oil, of course, but were trying to argue with the Senator from Texas that the item ought not to be in this kind of a bill. Of course, if it were in any other kind of a bill they would still be against it.

When the amendment of the Senator from Maryland came up to-day, I did not rise and, with a lot of pretense, say, "Now, let me suggest to the Senator from Maryland that his beer amendment has no place in this taxation measure." No; I walked up and faced the question, and voted on it. I did not try to sidetrack the issue. I did not try to lead it down a blind alley and assassinate it for some other cause than the one I professed to entertain.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator permits himself to be convicted by the Senator from Maryland of having exhausted the entire afternoon on one tariff item, may I suggest to him that I find by reference to the record at the desk that he began speaking about 4 o'clock, and has been speaking less than two hours on one tariff item.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator, and I am going to conclude. Of course, the Senator from Maryland was talking in favor of an item that he was strongly for, and he was perfectly willing to consume as much time of the Senate as his audience would enjoy. Now that I am talking about an item he is not in favor of, of course he is for speed, he is for hurrying up; and I say that in all kindness to the Senator. I do not think the Senator from Texas has consumed as much time of the Senate during his entire service here as has the Senator from Maryland on the one subject of liquor. Just on that one subject alone I believe the Senator from Maryland has taken up more time of the Senate since the Senator from Texas has been here than the Senator from Texas has taken up on discussing food, drink, clothes, and everything else.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the country is equally considering using more time in considering the liquor problem than the tariff on oil. I think that will be very evident after the next election.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is evidently the reason for the Senator's enthusiasm, then, in opposing the tariff on oil and being for a tax on beer. He thinks the country's inclinations are along that line, which probably explains some of his enthusiasm.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I add that I think the difficulties and complications have arisen from the failure to realize that in the beer controversy there was a desire to get more strength, while in the oil matter things are a little slippery. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Illinois. He always contributes to the brilliance and interest of any debate in which he takes part.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I hope I have manifested no unkindness and no ill will in any reference I have made to him, and I likewise want to assure the Senator from Maryland that I meant no unkindness toward him.

Mr. President, this particular matter was provoked by the fact that Senators have been filling the public prints with statements to the effect, "Oh, no; these tariff items," as they call them, "have no place in a revenue bill."

Practically every revenue bill the Congress ever passed up to 1913 was in effect a tariff bill, because that was the way we raised the revenue. The first income tax bill the Government ever adopted since the Civil War was in 1894, when the income tax was carried in the Democratic tariff bill of that year. In 1913, with all branches of the Government in control of the Democrats, the tariff act of 1913 carried the income tax, and probably other internal taxes, to raise revenue.

That was good Democratic doctrine in 1913, and when did it become heresy to put two things into a bill when both of them ought to be there? This is a revenue item. The Senator from Tennessee and others say that it will not produce revenue. The Treasury itself admits that it will produce $5,000,000 a year, and the facts will disclose that it will come nearer producing $30,000,000 a year. If Senators are sincere, if they want revenue, here is one item on which we can get it.

I ask, Mr. President, in conclusion, that Senators bear in mind that this duty will put money into the Treasury, and that unless that money goes into the Treasury it will go into the coffers of four great importing oil companies, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Royal Dutch Shell, and the Mellon companies of Pennsylvania.

Let me say to Senators that the people of my State and of Oklahoma are being almost drowned in oil. Wells are shut down, and one of the reasons why we are not being able to produce oil is because the importers are bringing in a flood of foreign oil, paying not one cent to the Federal Treasury and paying not one cent to the States, except the gasoline tax.

In the interest of the American producers it is unfair and it is unjust. The other oil companies in this country have to produce domestic oil, and they compete with these four great companies. This tax is justified, this tax will raise revenue, and it will more nearly equalize the conditions of competition between these four great companies and the hundreds of small independent companies.

I submit the amendment to the Senate with the confident belief that it will produce revenue, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas permit me to call for a quorum, if it will not disturb him?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I make the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as bearing on the subject matter now before the Senate, a short article appearing in the Washington Daily News of to-day entitled "Oil Men Plan to Pass Tax Levy to Consumers."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

OIL MEN PLAN TO PASS TAX LEVY TO CONSUMERS—CONSUMERS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WILL BEAR BURDEN IF TARIFF PASSES—NEW JERSEY STANDARD NOTIFIES CUSTOMERS PRICES WILL BE INCREASED TO CARE FOR LEVIES—AFFECTS OTHER DISTRICTS—NOTICE IS GIVEN IN CONNECTION WITH USE OF FUEL-PETROLEUM CONTRACTS FOR NEXT WINTER

By Leo R. Sack

Anticipating approval by Congress of an oil tariff in the new revenue bill, distributing companies serving the Washington territory already are indicating that the burden will be passed along to the consumer. It is understood that a similar increase will follow in all Atlantic seaboard communities.

In contracts being mailed to customers, old and anticipated, for their fuel-oil supplies for next winter—both residential, apartmental, and business—Standard Oil of New Jersey is attaching this proviso:

"It is agreed that the maximum prices quoted shall be increased by the amount of taxes, duties, and other charges Standard may be required by any governmental authority to collect or pay with respect to importation, manufacture, transportation, sale, delivery, and/or use of the fuel oil covered hereby."

FIX LEVY AT 21 CENTS

The proposed tariff, as reported to the Senate, is 21 cents a barrel. The tax bill as it passed the House authorized a 42-cent tax. Senate advocates of the tariff hope to restore the House rate. On a basis of 42 gallons to a barrel this means a 1-cent-a-gallon tax.

Most inside residential oil-storage tanks hold 275 gallons. This will be an increased cost of $2.75 every time the tank is filled.

The tariff proviso, in language identical with that used by Standard, is contained in oil contracts mailed to Washington consumers by other distributors.

In addition to the anticipated tariff increase new contracts also contain a flat price increase of three-fourths of a cent a gallon over the maximum price for last winter. This increase, it is explained, is traceable to the boost in mid-continent field prices, an increase which closely followed passage of the oil-tariff plan by the House.

NOT AIMED AT CONSUMER

Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, chief Senate advocate of the oil tariff, said to-day that the plan never contemplated a boost in price for consumers, but was intended chiefly as a competitive measure in order to increase consumption of American production and decrease foreign consumption.

At local headquarters of Standard of New Jersey it was not known definitely whether the oil sold to Washington consumers was of American, South American, or Mexican origin. It was suggested that production from all fields is refined in Baltimore and Bayonne, N. J.

Other Washington distributors thought Texas and Oklahoma oil was being refined for furnace purposes at Baltimore, but they were not sure.

COVERS WIDE FIELD

Under terms of the Standard proviso the tariff, or other taxes to be levied, can automatically be added to the bill regardless of whether the crude is produced in Oklahoma or Venezuela, unless extreme care is employed to prevent unlawful charges.

Senator THOMAS announces that he will investigate to determine how consumers in Washington and other Atlantic seaboard cities will be affected.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it is not my intention to consume much of the time of the Senate in discussing the proposed excise taxes on petroleum imports. It is highly important that the Senate complete its work of writing the tax bill at an early date. Business all over the country is at a standstill, waiting to see what Congress is going to do about balancing the Budget.

The country, to put it mildly, is out of patience with Congress for not making better speed in balancing the Budget. The country expects Congress to pass a tax bill, and do it at the earliest possible moment. I would urge upon Senators to accept the 1-cent-a-gallon tax provided in the bill as it came from the House, in the interest of the economic welfare of the country and in the interest of an early adjournment of Congress.

Mr. President, the imposition of this proposed excise tax is simply a matter of delayed justice to the third greatest industry in the United States. Petroleum should have been granted an adequate degree of tariff protection when the revenue act of 1930 was enacted.

I am not exaggerating in the least when I say that the domestic oil industry in facing ruin unless these importers of cheap foreign oil are made to pay their share of the cost of government and compete with the producers of domestic oil on comparatively equal terms.

The ruin of the independent oil industry, Mr. President, means business stagnation, lack of purchasing power, continued unemployment, and poverty for hundreds of thousands of people in the Southwestern and other oil States.

Unless Congress acts I fear that thousands of small wells in my own State of Kansas and in other States will be shut down. Four thousand are now shut down. These small wells on the pump, producing only a few barrels a day, are the backbone of the industry and truly conserve our oil supply. Once closed down, they can not be reopened. Salt water takes them, and we will have to depend upon flush fields, upon gambling, in other words, for petroleum for the people of the United States.

In Kansas to-day 12,000 oil workers are out of employment. Whole communities are practically idle, facing ruin, the citizens of these communities facing, many of them already enduring, actual poverty. And it is unnecessary. Enough of an excise tax to end the use of imports as a club to beat down the independent oil producers would restore the purchasing power of the oil States.

And while their own oil, produced by American labor from wells on which they took a chance when they drilled them, is unmarketable, these same oil communities, these oil States, this great oil section, see themselves ruined by sales of foreign oil, cheaply produced by underpaid foreign labor, run into the country without paying a cent to the cost of government.

The four big importers are not only selling foreign oil in most unfair competition with American labor and American capital, they also are selling out the people of the oil States of America. They are driving out of business the independent oil producers of the United States, the independents who are the only protection of 120,000,000 people from the exactions of a grasping oil monopoly. They are driving these independents into bankruptcy so they can buy the American oil reserves at bankrupt prices. Then the monopoly will be complete.

These importations are ruining the domestic producers, and the consumers are not getting any permanent benefit from that ruin. Gasoline prices are held up to the price justified by the American costs of production, but the prices paid for crude oil are held down to the cost of foreign production—foreign production with cheap labor and with practically no taxes to pay.

There is one other feature. When the oil reserves have been gobbled up by the big integrated companies the Government will be at the mercy of an oil monopoly in times of emergency, and again the people of the country must pay.

Adequate tariff protection for the oil industry should provide a tariff of at least $1 a barrel on crude and fuel oil.

I will say at this point that in my judgment a tax of 3 or 4 cents a gallon on gasoline would be justified even in a revenue measure if the American labor in American refineries along the Atlantic coast in the United States is to be protected against the products of cheap foreign labor employed in Venezuela. It seems to me, however, that the size of the excise tax on gasoline should be a matter of more direct concern to Senators from the seaboard States; that in the interest of American labor in their own States they should be lined up for the higher tax on imports of gasoline from abroad. But that is aside from the main question.

The point I desire to make in this connection is that the proposed rates of 1 cent a gallon on crude and fuel oil do not afford adequate tariff protection at all. If this were a tariff bill before us, we should be insisting upon a protective duty of at least $1 a barrel instead of 42 cents a barrel, the excise tax proposed to be levied in this bill.

In other words, the 1-cent-a-gallon excise tax—or 42 cents a barrel—is a tax for revenue, not entirely a tariff for protection.

The proposed excise tax of 1 cent a gallon, according to the estimates from the oil industry, will produce an annual revenue of around $43,000,000. I am aware there is a difference of opinion on this point. I have every confidence in those who have presented me with this estimate.

The independent oil producers also admit frankly that this measure, with the extremely low excise tax of 1 cent a gallon, or 42 cents a barrel, will probably not prevent the importation of one gallon of Venezuelan oil. It is not in the slightest degree an embargo.

The truth of this statement I believe is amply confirmed by the report of the Tariff Commission to Congress made last December. Without cumbering the RECORD with all the statistics and analyses of the Tariff Commission, I will simply refer to the statement made therein that the difference in cost of petroleum laid down at Atlantic seaboard ports was $1.03 a barrel. The cost of mid-continent oil at Atlantic ports, according to the Tariff Commission, is $1.90 a barrel; the cost of Venezuelan oil is 87 cents a barrel, a difference of $1.03 a barrel. In other words, a protective tariff duty on petroleum products would be $1.03 a barrel instead of 42 cents a barrel, if that duty were levied to cover the differences in cost of production.

It is a natural question, in view of this difference in production and delivery costs, to ask what benefit will the American producers of domestic petroleum get from an excise tax of 42 cents a barrel, if it is not a protective tariff, if it will not result in shutting off the flow of imports of cheaply produced foreign oil.

Mr. President, I believe I can show how the domestic oil producers, and, in the long run, the consumers of gasoline in the United States, will benefit by this excise tax, though not to the extent they would if we were in position to give the oil industry the tariff protection to which it is justly entitled by any reasonable theory of tariff protection.

Mr. President, this question of oil imports is considerably more than a battle between domestic producers and the importers of cheaply produced foreign oil. The real question is whether or not a few big integrated oil companies are to have a monopoly of the petroleum industry in these United States.

Mr. President, the oil industry is one of the major industries of the country. It represents a capitalization of some twelve thousand millions of dollars. Probably 20 large companies, of the thousands of oil companies in the United States, have 80 per cent of this capitalization. Ten Standard Oil groups' companies, plus 10 non-Standard companies, today have practically a nation-wide monopoly of all branches of the oil industry except the production of crude oil.

These 20 companies, I might say—and there are figures in the record of hearings before the House Interstate Commerce Committee on a proposed pipe-line regulation bill to substantiate this statement—produce a little less than half of the crude oil produced in the United States. They do not, as yet, control the oil reserves of the United States, nor the producing wells.

These 20 companies, however, own practically three-fourths of the refining capacity of the United States, more than 90 per cent of the cracking capacity, more than 90 per cent of the transportation pipe-line facilities, nearly 100 per cent of the storage facilities, and about 85 per cent of the distribution facilities.

All these few big integrated companies need in order to have a complete monopoly is to bankrupt the independent oil producers, who still produce one-half the crude produced in the United States.

Mr. President, it is this threat, a threat that is almost a promise to-day, of a complete monopoly of the petroleum industry, that makes this excise tax we are considering of such vital interest to the entire country. We are not waging a fight here for the independent oil producers, nor for the oil States and their peoples alone. We are fighting right now to win the first in a series of battles to protect the people of the entire country from the grasp of this petroleum monopoly.

I want to say right now that when this monopoly is extended to the production of oil, to the control of the oil reserves, then the consumers of gasoline in this country, the industries that require fuel oil for power, will pay "through the nose" for petroleum products. In countries where the monopoly has been completed, gasoline prices are to-day twice as high, sometimes three times as high, as in the United States.

I say the only protection the public has against monopoly and the high retail prices that monopoly will bring are the independent producers of petroleum.

Congress can take a step toward preventing the destruction of these independent producers, and averting national economic slavery to an oil monopoly, by levying the proposed excise tax on imports of cheaply produced foreign petroleum and its products.

Mr. President, I would again call attention at this point to the fact that the independent oil producers, who are asking protection against the threatened oil monopoly through an excise tax on oil imports at this time and in this bill, now produce half the crude oil produced in the United States. As long as these independent producers can sell crude oil at a profit they can stay in business, and the oil monopoly can not become an accomplished fact. But, Mr. President, if the independent producers continue month after month, year after year, to do business at a loss, it is only a question of time—and not a very long time now—until they will be forced to sell their properties, dispose of their leases, take themselves clear out of the picture.

Who will take over the oil properties of the independents when they shall be forced to liquidate their holdings? The answer is self-evident, Mr. President. The big integrated companies, which already have a practical monopoly on refining, on transportation, on distribution of petroleum and its products, will then complete the link in the chain of oil monopoly, and control petroleum from the ground to the gasoline tank. The consumers of gasoline and the industries which depend upon petroleum for fuel will be helpless in the grasp of the oil monopoly.

Now, Mr. President, neither I nor any of those others making this fight for justice to the oil industry and for economic freedom for the people of the United States, so far as petroleum is concerned, claim that protection from the demoralizing effects of unrestricted importations of foreign oil alone will solve the problems of the domestic oil industry. We do not claim that this protection alone will prevent the threatened oil monopoly, but we do claim that without taxation of imports of foreign oil the monopolistic group of oil companies—and they own the companies which are engaged in importing foreign oil—these big companies can beat down the prices for crude oil, ruin the independents, take over the oil resources of the Nation nearly 100 per cent, and make their monopoly complete.

It has been claimed by those opposing the oil excise tax—and these are the same interests which are opposed to tariff protection for oil—that the foreign oil does not come into competition with that produced in the United States. Such a claim is preposterous, ridiculous, entirely at variance with the facts in the case.

The fact is—and I do not believe it can be successfully refuted—that every barrel of foreign oil actually displaces a barrel of domestic oil.

But, Mr. President, the damage to the domestic oil industry, the threat of monopoly contained in the untaxed importation of foreign oil, goes further than that. The competition of foreign oil goes further than actual displacement of domestic oil that otherwise would be used. The competition of this foreign oil reduces the price of domestic crude oil to the price at which foreign-produced crude oil can be delivered and sold in the United States, entirely regardless of the relatively small amount of such imports of foreign oil.

Here is what happens: Much of our domestic production is refined near the fields in which it is produced; some of it is pipe-lined long distances to other States to be refined. But in either case the marketing areas have their choice of using domestic products or using foreign products to supply local demand.

A great amount of oil is sold through brokers, and the fact that the independents still produce half the domestic production of petroleum creates a partially free market, in spite of the monopoly of refining, transportation, and distribution of refined products.

It is well understood to the oil trade that a very small amount of gasoline will break the market for all that is offered in that area for the same day.

Here is an example of how the thing works as explained to me by the independent oil producers: When gasoline is offered from Baltimore to the Great Lakes territory—or suppose we say from Russia, as Russian oil has been delivered within the last few months at Detroit at very low prices—then that gasoline comes into direct competition as a price-fixing element with all the other gasoline offered for the same trade area. The mid-continent producer must meet the Baltimore price—depending on Venezuelan oil costs—or the Russian price, depending upon we do not know exactly what kind of labor in Russia. The domestic producer, therefore, finds his market price determined, in the last analysis, very largely by the price at which Venezuelan or Russian oil can be offered, even though that foreign oil may not actually be delivered in the trade territory affected.

What I have just stated, Mr. President, is the reason why even the 42 cents a barrel import tax proposed, even though it did not shut out a single barrel of foreign oil from the Atlantic seaboard, would help the domestic producer of oil to keep out of bankruptcy and stave off the threatened complete oil monopoly.

There would be that 42 cents a barrel import tax, which would afford a cushion for the domestic crude market. This 42 cents a barrel excise tax, while it would not prevent the importation of foreign oil, while it would give the Federal Treasury the benefit of revenue, at the same time would protect the interior market from price-fixing competition of foreign oil.

What I have just shown, Mr. President, is that even the 42 cents a barrel tax on imports of foreign oil, while it will not shut out imports and therefore will be a revenue-producing measure for the Federal Government, still will afford a protection of 42 cents a barrel for the domestic producer in the interior marketing areas of the country.

I do not believe it necessary for me to argue the point that an increase in the price of crude oil means a corresponding increase in gasoline prices to the consumer. Certain industries along the Atlantic seaboard, notably in New England, may have to pay higher prices for fuel oil. But, Mr. President, it seems to those of us who come from the West and Southwest that it comes with poor grace for eastern manufacturing States to protest against a small amount of protection for an American industry. For 100 years New England has enjoyed the benefits of tariff protection.

The West and Southwest, Mr. President, have been good customers of New England. We have paid the prices for the benefits New England has derived from the policy of tariff protection. We have received little of its benefits. I say if this proposal were a protective-tariff measure in fact, if it would increase the cost of crude and fuel oil to New England industries 85 or 100 cents a barrel, still New England, in all fairness, should not object.

It is not only the principle involved, Mr. President, but as a matter of principle, of consistency, I would say that Representatives from New England ought to be lined up solidly for tariff protection for oil. They ought to be willing to grant to the West and Southwest, when this industry is languishing, a small measure of the tariff protection which they praise so highly and from which they have derived the benefit. I say New England should be united for oil protection, even if the bill went to the extent of actually affording tariff protection by curtailing imports of oil, which this small excise tax of 1 cent a gallon will not do.

But, Mr. President, if New England is willing to abandon her principles if those principles affect her pocketbook, there still is a good pocket reason why the Atlantic seaboard should not oppose this excise tax on foreign oil. Most of the 20 oil-producing States, certainly those in the mid-continent field, are good customers of New England manufacturing industries. When we have purchasing power, we buy liberally, and, thanks in large part to tariff protection accorded New England during the last century, we buy largely of New England. But a customer without purchasing power is a poor customer to have, and that is the situation the oil States are in to-day. They do not have purchasing power. They can not buy as they would like to buy from New England.

If this excise tax would help the oil industry, Mr. President, it would help the entire territory in which the oil industry vies with agriculture in being the main source of community prosperity; and that would mean lessened unemployment, more business, more purchasing power, for nearly a score of States in the Union. As I stated before, most of these States are so situated that they can be good customers of New England's manufacturing industries. For that reason I say, Mr. President, that it is to the selfish interest of New England to support this oil excise tax; and I am glad to believe that a number of Senators from New England realize both the principle of equity and the principle of economics involved.

Mr. President, I could proceed for some time portraying the plight of the oil industry; but I do not believe there is any question in the minds of Senators—nor anywhere in the country—as to actual conditions. Opponents of this excise tax do not question the plight of the oil industry, nor its effect on the entire economic structure of the country. So I will not go into that phase of the situation at this time.

In closing, I want to appeal to the Senators to consider this question from the larger viewpoint of the national public interest. Here is a basic industry which can be assisted by this small tax. When the oil industry starts back on the road to prosperity it will bring prosperity and buying power to a large section of the country, for much of the oil territory can not have purchasing power until the oil industry gets back on a living basis.

I would repeat also that the levying of this tax will be of material assistance in preventing a complete oil monopoly

Those of us supporting this oil tax are perfectly well aware that protection alone will not cure the ills of the oil industry. The domestic industry has a big job ahead of it to control production and to put into effect a real conservation program. But all efforts to curtail production in this country will fail if something is not done to regulate importations. The independent producers are going to have to turn their properties over to the big integrated oil industries unless these big companies are prevented from using imports of foreign oil to bankrupt the independents. That comes back again to what I consider the most important object of this legislation, namely, to prevent a monopoly of the entire oil industry. As I see it, a vote for the oil excise tax is a vote against a threatened oil monopoly that will cost the people of this country thousands of millions of dollars within the next few years if it is not prevented. I sincerely trust that a majority of the Senate will take the same view that I do and vote for the oil excise tax of 1 cent a gallon on crude and fuel oil.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS AND LEGISLATION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interview with Mr. Owen D. Young on the depression, written by Mr. John W. Owens, editor of the Baltimore Sun.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The interview is as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Wednesday, May 18, 1932]

RADICAL RELIEF PLAN URGENT, SAYS YOUNG; DELAY CALLED UNWISE—UNITED STATES MUST ACT TO SET WHEELS GOING AT ONCE—BUSINESS CONDITIONS CALL FOR EXTRAORDINARY EFFORTS, HE INSISTS—CREDIT OF UNION IS NOT INVOLVED—PORK-BARREL LEGISLATION NOT INTENDED IN PROGRAM

NEW YORK, May 17.—Owen D. Young to-day explained in detail the reasons for his support of the radical relief program offered by Senator ROBINSON, Democratic leader. The presentation of that plan, involving $2,000,000,000 of construction projects led almost instantly to one of similar outline from President Hoover.

Briefly, Mr. Young's position is as follows:

That it is possible to carry forward such a plan without its degenerating into an orgy of pork-barrel expenditures.

That it is not based on any philosophy of spending ourselves into prosperity or of getting rich through extravagance.

That it can be executed on economically sound lines and with fruitful results.

That it has the same justification as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

That it is, in fact, the affirmative, onward-moving, trade-producing complement of that institution, which was created to arrest decay of financial and industrial enterprises.

NOT SAFE TO DELAY LONGER

"It is a question of the facts and of one's judgment on the facts," said Mr. Young in summing up his position, "and the facts as I judge them are such that it is not wise and not safe longer to defer this action.

"I am willing to take my share of the responsibility for a course which may be called bold and may be called radical and which most of us would prefer to escape. It is necessary, and it can, with intelligence and good will, be successfully consummated."

FOLLOWS REFUSAL TO BE CANDIDATE

The statement to-day follows publication yesterday of Mr. Young's letter to the publisher of the Little Falls Times, printed in his home community, in which he said "definitely and finally" that he could not accept the Democratic nomination for President. His part in producing the Robinson plan and his public indorsement of it had immediately placed his name in the forefront of presidential politics.

To be fully effective in the public emergency, Mr. Young believed he had emphatically to reiterate his unwillingness and inability to be considered for the nomination.

MUST HELP MAN IN DISTRESS

"Let me say, in the first place," he said to-day, "that I often wonder what the man who has lost his job, the man on part time, the man whose home or farm is being taken under the mortgage, thinks when he hears people in authority talking about such impersonal things as balanced Budgets, protection of national credit, maintenance of financial institutions through organization of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and so on. I imagine that men in any such plight must feel that the discussion is all very far removed from them.

"All that is in the plan offered in Washington, all that I am about to say, means nothing if it does not help the man whose job is gone, the man on part time, the man now losing out in the struggle to keep his home or his farm. It means nothing if it will not serve to bring back jobs, or at least to start the process of bringing back jobs.

"It means nothing if it will not help to restore security to the obscure individual who has been overtaken by misfortune, to restore his family in the possession of the means of wholesome life, to restore peace of mind.

"What I am advocating is intended to accomplish those ends. If I seem to be talking about other things, about governmental policy, about great public and private enterprises, it is because we must work back through those institutions and instrumentalities to reach the individual.

HOLDS FOR BALANCED BUDGET

"Now about the proposals that have been made by Senator ROBINSON. Before all else I wish to say that it is absolutely essential that the Government's Budget shall be balanced. Preservation of the Nation's credit is, in this time of crisis, our sure bulwark. Under no circumstances must that bulwark be weakened.

"This calls for new taxes. They must be levied. It also calls for economies in the administration of the Government. They must be enforced. The relief plan does not invade the Government's credit, as I shall explain.

SPEAKS WORD FOR CONGRESS

"But here I want to stop and say a word for the Members of Congress. It doubtless is confusing to have many persons insisting that economies must be enforced and many persons, often the same persons, insisting that employment should be provided. It should not be surprising if, in the midst of the tumult, Members of Congress feel that in voting against economies they are saving jobs and making the best of an extraordinarily tangled business. They may vote wrong in entire good faith.

"The point to be kept in mind is that we accomplish nothing by waste. We need to eliminate waste and to conserve all of our resources for employment in constructive effort. In one aspect of the matter, waste in the Government means reduction of resources out of which direct relief must be granted.

"It is not just to keep one man in a useless job when that may result in insufficient aid for many men who have no jobs at all and simply must be helped. In another aspect of the matter, waste in the Government means reduction of resources with which to carry on productive enterprises which will provide many jobs.

TIME TO STOP BORROWING

"We must get this Budget balanced, by new taxes and by economies, else our best efforts in other directions will go for naught. It is no use now to argue whether we should have balanced a year ago or two years ago, instead of borrowing. It is no use to argue that because we did borrow we may keep on borrowing.

"The time is plainly here to stop borrowing for current operations and current expenditures, and to make our national credit absolutely secure. We have need of it for vastly more important things than the ordinary operations of the Government.

"On the same principle we must turn our backs on all proposals to issue fiat money. The experience of the world shows that policies of that character lead to national bankruptcy. We do need more money to carry on the business of the country, and, of course, I do not mean merely currency.

"I also mean credit dollars and all the forms in which money is provided by our banking system in normal times. The terrific downward spiral of liquidation shortened the supply disastrously. But the increase of the supply can not be governed by political machinery. It must be governed by duly constituted financial authority.

MUST AID IN WORLD SITUATION

"Now, with that much said about our basic policy in Washington, I come to the relief plan. When I was asked down to Washington to talk with some of the leaders, I said to them that I believed we could, by courageous and consistent effort, increase our prosperity in a degree, which I shall call X, without regard to developments in other nations.

"I also said that I believed that to attain the full degree of prosperity to which our resources entitle us we should have to do our part in accommodating and composing the world situation. That further and full degree of prosperity I called Y.

SHOULD SEPARATE PROBLEMS

"I suggested that we cut straight through the tangle of problems and of possible remedies, putting everything that had to do with X on one side and everything that had to do with Y on the other. And I further suggested that we then concentrate on X.

"I make that proposal with clear realization that we may not hope to restore full prosperity until we settle the Y problems. But our form of government is such, our conditions are such, our present popular moods are such, and the state of international affairs is such, partly due to our own policies, that no instant relief is in sight in the world situation.

QUICK ACTION NECESSARY

"And we must have instant relief. I am convinced that in these months that are just ahead we must move quickly and firmly to utilize every resource that lies in our own hands, and I am convinced that one of our most effective resources is the power of the Government to stand as a temporary credit bridge between, on the one hand, the materials and the human labor that are idle and, on the other, numerous enterprises that are meritorious, that would be financed and pressed to completion without question in normal times and that to-day are helpless because investors have suffered so greatly that they have become terrified.

"You see, I am not thinking at all of pork-barrel construction. I am not trying to have the Government run up post-office buildings for which there is no real use, dredge creeks where a commercial vessel will never venture, build roads in places where the surrounding land is not worth as much as the modern roads.

PROJECTS MUST HAVE ACTUAL MERIT

"And I am not trying to have the Federal Government tempt the States into that kind of activity for activity's own sake, that kind of spending for spending's own sake.

"Public construction by Federal, State, and local governments that has actual merit; yes, but no more, and I want honesty and courage in drawing the line. Direct grants to the unemployed would be cheaper than spending on construction merely for the sake of construction; the same amount of money would take care of many more people and probably would result in wider purchases of commodities.

"Besides, construction merely for the sake of construction would give the country a great mass of white elephants, scattered all over the land, that would call for a heavy maintenance bill in the future.

WOULD INCLUDE PRIVATE ENTERPRISES

"I say, take the projects of the Federal Government, of the State governments, and of the local governments which, after investigation and study, have been found worthy and which would be built were credit conditions normal. Start on them. At the same time, go on to private construction enterprises which have been found worthy and which would be built were credit conditions normal. Start them. In the aggregate a very large program of construction could be put under way within a comparatively short time.

POWER TO EARN WAY AS BASIS

"Please note that all of the projects I have in mind, whether public or private, are to be based upon their power to earn their own way. It is possible, in some of the cities, to build new post offices that would save the Federal Government enough, in comparison with existing antiquated structures, to defray the cost of the new outlay.

"There is an immense difference between building a post office under those conditions and building a post office in some other place for no purpose other than to satisfy local pride, or, in such times as these, to serve the mistaken idea that any kind of activity at all is good.

THEN ONLY CONTINGENT LIABILITY

"Well, if these projects, whether public or private, are to earn their own way, if they are to be self-liquidating, then the provision of $2,000,000,000 of credit by the Government represents only a contingent liability. If we provide $2,000,000,000 for that purpose, we are not unbalancing our Budget. We are not in any sense falling into an error comparable to borrowing for current operations of the Government. We are getting a permanent, self-sustaining value which will carry the expenditure.

"If a mistake is made in embarking upon a given public enterprise, a loss may fall back on the Government. If a mistake is made in financing some industrial enterprise, a loss may fall back on the Government. But that is a contingent liability. It is not an absolute one.

"I think this difference was overlooked in the stock and bond markets here when they first reacted adversely to the proposal of a $2,000,000,000 program to be financed by the Government. It is overlooked by others.

WARNS OF TOO MUCH RED TAPE

"Now, there are several observations that are in order at this point. It is obvious, in the first place, that there must be machinery of some sort in the Government. Existing machinery may be found or new machinery may have to be created which can control this great expenditure freely, quickly, and directly.

"It is dangerous and probably futile to embark upon such an undertaking, and then to tie it in a maze of red tape. Responsibility must be concentrated and authority must be granted equal to the responsibility.

"I believe that if we look straight at this thing, if we look straight at the conditions and the measures that are available at the moment, we can rise above factionalism and above partisanship at Washington; we can agree to set up the right kind of machinery; we can agree on the right kind of men to run the machinery, and we can get the men. We can do that with clear understanding that some mistakes will be made, but we can also do it as men of backbone who prefer risking mistakes in action to yielding to the major, the perhaps fatal, mistake of inertia and inaction in a crisis.

ALLOCATION WILL REQUIRE CARE

"Another observation grows out of the first. It is that great care should be taken to guard against efforts to allocate the construction fund between the States upon any rigid basis. If we lean far in that direction, we may find ourselves making mistakes that otherwise could easily be avoided.

"There are some States in which there may be relatively little public work that could be economically done and relatively few private projects that lack deserved capital. There are others where one could quickly turn the wheels moving on a very large number of enterprises which would draw materials from all parts of the country.

EFFECT WILL BE WIDESPREAD

"We need to keep constantly in mind that it is the repercussions of an undertaking, not the undertaking itself, that matter chiefly when we come to measure values. A big piece of construction in a great industrial center can be far more fruitful to distant agricultural areas than unnecessary construction in those areas.

"When construction is started in the great industrial center it immediately begins to be felt in remote areas, which are called upon for raw materials to be used on the job itself. And the remote areas also benefit in the production of things that go to make the food and clothing of the men who work in all the links of the long chain of labor and transportation.

TIME FOR GOVERNMENT TO ACT

"Another point that we should be at pains to remember is that self-liquidating public enterprises, whether of the Federal, State, or local governments, may not quickly absorb the $2,000,000,000. In that event, I am not in favor of pressing the money on any governmental agency. I am in favor of turning to private projects that have merit and getting the money out to them.

"I distinctly want this money used for self-liquidating things. But I want to get it out. I want it used. I think the time has come when the Government must step in. And when it steps in, I want it to step in in no half-hearted manner. I do not want it to be scared to death at the thought of financing a private project.

"Finally, a brief comment is in order on the effect this $2,000,000,000 construction proposal will have on the supply of credit for private business. Intelligent people are bound to ask that question. My answer is that $2,000,000,000 put into self-liquidating projects wastes no credit and deprives private business of none of its usual resources.

PROPERLY PLACED CREDIT NOT WASTED

"Credit placed in meritorious public enterprises is not wasted. If the Government builds a modern and efficient post office in an important city, saves money in operation and serves the interests of business, the money used, the credit employed is no more wasted than is the credit employed in making a necessary utility extension. And, of course, to the extent that the $2,000,000,000 loan is used to finance meritorious private enterprises now held up for lack of capital the use of credit is identical with that which would occur in normal times. Only the conduit through which credit flows has been changed.

"In a word, we are not starting a new and sterile consumption of the Nation's credit supply. We are creating a new channel through which credit may move from the reservoirs to the industry and trade of the Nation, and we are compelled to create this new and temporary channel because the old and familiar ones of private enterprise have collapsed at vital points.

OTHER INDUSTRIES WILL REACT

"Now, if we conceive this thing boldly and resolutely; if we then move to carry it out by cutting through the red tape of officialdom; if we put the enterprise in the hands of capable men and give them the authority to act, what will follow?

"Some mistakes, of course; but if construction does start, mines and lumberyards and quarries and brickyards must start; if construction does start, railroads must increase their car loadings and bring out of idleness their workers; mechanics in the cities must put on their overalls and get down their tools. If construction does start, more groceries must be bought, more shoes, and more clothes.

ACTION REVIVES CONFIDENCE

"What then? We all say that revival of confidence is our greatest need, our greatest problem, and we tell the truth. But wnat is it that revives confidence? What save action? Give a man all the resources in the world, and if he broods and drools he is beaten. Give a man all the burdens in the world, and if he gets on his feet and faces front and starts on his way, courage and faith mount in his breast. I say, make the start!

"Do I like this idea of the Government making the start by setting up a credit bridge by which idle labor and idle material may pass over into new undertakings? Of course I do not. I have spent my life in private business and I have believed that private business could operate the great machine by which our labor and our materials are exchanged and converted into things of use for all of us.

CITES ACTION ON SECURITIES

"But I am not willing to sit idly by, my hands in my lap, when things crumble and crumble and crumble, and finally the point is reached where further crumbling may cause such disaster as this Nation has never known.

"If we are too confused and too terrified to act individually, then I say close up ranks and act as a body—which is what happens when the Government steps in. We did it when the collapse of security values ran beyond reason and the market prices lost all relation to intrinsic worth. We stepped in as a body, as a Government, and organized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and we make its capital, provided from public funds, a barrier and a brake against that unreasonable market situation.

"We organized our collective strength to withstand that strain, and bank failures have been reduced to a minimum. I say that the time has come to step in as a united body, as a Government, and take risks in starting business, in doing business, that individuals fear to bear.

EXPLAINS NEED OF SPECIAL TAX

"There are one or two subordinate features of this plan which seem to have led to some misunderstanding. One is the special tax. It is asked: Why a special tax if the projects are to be self-supporting? The explanation is that, as in nearly all enterprises, we may expect a period in which money will be going out and no returns coming it. We must take care of interest during construction. It seemed wise to me to have a special tax to sustain the loan in this respect. I suggested a special tax on corporations, since they will directly benefit from the program. The tax for this purpose would not be especially heavy.

"The recommendation of the 30-hour week also seems to have led to some misunderstanding. Of course, no one had in mind any measure which would attempt to tell all the business concerns in the country to go on a 30-hour week. What we had in mind was that, in this $2,000,000,000 construction program, the Government should require all contractors to operate on a 30-hour week in order to stagger employment and spread it out as far as possible.

TAKES UP AID TO STATES

"Now, a final word on these questions—these questions which relate to problems that are entirely within our borders. Precisely as it seemed wise to have a special tax which would cover interest during construction, it seemed wise to have some fund in the Federal Government which could be used to aid the States in giving out-of-hand relief until the construction program begins to be felt and to restore the confidence of private business.

"I know there are some States and cities which have been able to care for their own unemployed and are not disposed to ask the Federal Government to aid. I have nothing but admiration for that method. I wish it could be followed in every State, in every city. But my information is that in some of the States, especially the very populous States which have great industrial cities within their borders, the volume of unemployment has become so great and the complexities of local credit conditions have become so acute that it is extremely doubtful that local authorities will be able to cope with the situation.

FEARS SITUATION IS GROWING WORSE

"Again, it is a question of the facts. If people are hungry, and if their local authorities can not relieve them, I am in favor of the Federal Government lending the necessary money. And my information is that those conditions are likely to be reached very soon in a number of the most important centers.

"That's my story. We have reached the stage, I believe, where we are confronted with the choice between trusting that the crumbling process has reached its end (risking absolute national disaster if it has not) and turning around the emergency with emergency methods. For my part, I prefer to chance the making of mistakes in trying to pull myself out of this calamity rather than to chance the calamity's becoming complete. I want to move; I want to fight.

MUST TAKE UP TARIFF AND DEBTS

"Now, let me say a word in conclusion about those questions beyond our borders that must be settled before we can achieve the full measure of prosperity to which we are entitled. We must get hold of this tariff question, of this debts question, of this disarmament question. But it seems to me that we can not get hold of them until we establish a strong liberal leadership, which will see the foreign questions as a whole, which will educate the people of our country to an intelligent and generous attitude, and which will summon to our aid the intelligent and the generous in other nations.

"In the field of tariffs our enactment of the Smoot-Hawley law has been followed by reprisals and retaliations, or, if you prefer, imitations by all the other nations of the earth. Every nation has now got itself into a position which its more competent leaders know is a disaster, and yet all of the nations are so murderously armed in an economic sense that not one of them dares to turn back lest it be overwhelmed.

MAY BE ABLE TO START BALL MOVING

"That is a well-nigh hopeless situation, and yet its very hopelessness, its very erection of disasters common to all, does produce the possibility that if we can evolve strong, determined, liberal leadership we can start the ball rolling toward correction through reciprocal adjustments.

"And similarly we must have a sense of the interdependence of nations in the modern world, of the unity for good or for evil that is a condition of our times before we can establish reason in the treatment of the debts and of armaments. The latter is at once a grave economic burden and a potent cause of the political and economic tension that makes reason so difficult to follow in international affairs.

TAKES UP FARMERS' PLIGHT

"We must get on with these matters as soon as possible. For five years before the collapse I urged that we were not safe in this Nation so long as the immense farming population was selling in an open world market and being compelled to buy in a protected home market. The efforts to correct that condition by lending the farmer money from land banks, from intermediate-credit banks, from farm boards only served to disguise the true situation.

"The farmer borrowed and he bought automobiles and tractors and radios and what not, as the balance of the country was doing. And then one day he was forced to the realization that he had to begin paying something on his notes. So he stopped buying, being further impelled to that course by the swift decline in his prices.

"And very soon after he stopped buying, factories began to cut down production and workmen began to lose their jobs. Then started the downward spiral of ever-narrowing consumption. We have had it proved that industry can not live in one economic world and keep the farmer in another.

WOULD TEST EQUALIZATION FEE

"We must take hold of these matters of the tariff and debts and armaments. I have suggested that a test of the equalization fee be made in the case of wheat, not because I like the idea but because I felt that until we could get a grip on the fundamental evils which weaken and destroy the farmer we should do what we can to pull him up by any remedies that might be workable. So I think it would be worth while to experiment in one crop with the equalization fee—pending the day when we may attempt more far-reaching cures, aimed at the cause of the disease.

"My argument for the program offered in Washington is then, in brief, that we must revive that measure of prosperity, represented by X, which lies entirely within our own borders. Our condition is such, in my opinion, as to make that imperative.

TAKE UP OTHER PROBLEMS LATER

"When we are a little steadier and a little calmer, I hope we can go on to deal with the Y questions, whose solution is required before we can have all that we could have if we were intelligent enough to make the best use of the men and the materials that nature has given us."

It is understood here that progress is being made in Washington in the negotiations on the Robinson plan and on the alternative which President Hoover announced on the day after Senator ROBINSON spoke. It appears to be possible that a substantial measure of agreement will be worked out between the leaders of the two parties.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the farmers of this country for the past decade have scarcely been able to earn a wage equal to the lowest paid, the common laborer, leaving them with little or no return, and in many cases actually losses on their capital investment.

On May 16 the United States Department of Agriculture issued a statement showing that the price level of farm commodities is still going downward, having reached the low point of 59 per cent of the pre-war level. The prices paid by farmers for articles which they have to buy are still 117 per cent of the pre-war level.

The average effective income received per farm family in 1930 was $598. This is the total average for operator's capital, unpaid labor of the operator and his family, and management of the operator. If a salary of $15 a week is allowed for the farmer's labor, not counting the labor of his family, the income would not have been sufficient to have paid his wages, and the total operations would have shown a loss of $182, with no payment for interest on investment. Such an allowance for salary is obviously a mere pittance and is insufficient to provide an adequate standard of living for the family. The Department of Agriculture estimated that in 1930 farmers lost a total of $346,000,000. They actually lost that amount. Their farm operations cost them that much more than they received, and this after allowing for the labor of the operators and their families.

It ought to be clearly understood that the farm family is of tremendous importance as a labor factor on the farm, and their time to a certain degree has to be taken into consideration when we are considering the expenses of operating a farm.

Such was the estimated loss incurred by farmers in 1930. Since then the prices of farm commodities have declined very greatly. The average price of farm commodities in 1930 was 117 per cent of the pre-war level, whereas to-day it is 59 per cent of the pre-war level; therefore, the losses this year obviously are much heavier than they were in 1930, as such prices are far below present costs of production.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a table showing the average income of farmers for the past seven years, as estimated by the United States Department of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Reward per farm family for labor and management and farm wages per year, without board, 1924–1930 [1]

Year	Income available for operator's capital, unpaid labor, and management	Reward for labor and management per farm family [2]	Farm wages per year without board [3]
1924	$862	$668	$567
1925	903	707	574
1926	874	683	586
1927	880	685	584
1928	866	665	584
1929	887	685	589
1930	598	425	535

[1] Table 8, p. 399, Crops and Markets, September, 1931, vol. 8, No. 9, by U. S. Department of Agriculture.
[2] Column 1, less 4.5 per cent interest allowance on operator's net capital investment.
[3] Farm wages per month without board multiplied by 12.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, agriculture represents more than a third—in fact, in the neighborhood of 44 per cent—of our total population. Is it any wonder that the buying power for the products of industry has dried up, when we consider these facts? For a decade the low prices of farm products and agriculture's disastrous condition have steadily reduced the buying power of nearly 44 per cent of the population of this country until it has reached a point where this great consuming group is unable to buy even the necessities of life, much less the large group of luxury and semiluxury products upon which many of our industries now depend.

How can this Congress adjourn without at least attempting to provide some real remedy for this distressing situation? How can Senators and Members of Congress face their rural constituents with the confession that they have done nothing to provide real relief for their distress?

Congress has the power to act. The events of the next few weeks will determine whether it has the will to act.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Davis	Keyes	Shortridge
Bankhead	Dickinson	La Follette	Smith
Barbour	Fess	Lewis	Smoot
Barkley	Frazier	Long	Steiwer
Bingham	George	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	Hale	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Harrison	Morrison	Townsend
Brookhart	Hatfield	Moses	Trammell
Bulkley	Hayden	Norbeck	Tydings
Bulow	Hebert	Norris	Vandenberg
Capper	Howell	Nye	Walcott
Carey	Hull	Oddie	Watson
Cohen	Johnson	Pittman	White
Connally	Jones	Reed
Copeland	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the day's business the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah and other Senators who are interested in this provision if it is not possible for us to get a unanimous-consent agreement that the debate on the oil provision of the bill will close at some time to-morrow, say at 2 o'clock?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I think we are going to be able to get through with this debate a whole lot quicker than that. I think we will be able to vote to-night on this item.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator that I am informed that there is one Senator who is very much interested in this provision, who wants to vote for it, but who will not be here until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator refer to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LONG. We think we can probably have him paired.

Mr. HARRISON. We are perfectly willing to fix a time if that is agreeable to the Senators who are interested.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I would suggest an agreement to vote not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow. It is possible that some Senator might wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If we close the debate too quickly, some Senator may desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which could only be offered, without an opportunity on the part of its author to address himself at all to his own amendment.

It is possible I may wish to propose an amendment to the amendment, and I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes at least. I would not want more than that length of time, if I desire to offer an amendment. The trouble with these unanimous-consent agreements so often is that two or three Senators take all the time, and no other Senator gets an opportunity to say anything. I suggest the hour of 3 o'clock. I will not object to the request if the hour is made 3 o'clock.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Mississippi whether his contemplated agreement embraces only the pending amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the request I had in contemplation was that debate close on the oil provision to-morrow at, say, 2 o'clock. I am not offering that suggestion now, in view of what the Senator from Florida has said. Then I would suggest that to-morrow Senators be recognized who are in favor of the proposition for half the time, and those opposing it for half the time. Of course, that would preclude anyone offering another amendment to the pending amendment or any other amendment after that, but the debate would close at 2 o'clock.

In view of what the Senator from Florida has said, I offer this unanimous-consent request, that general debate on the oil provision, the pending amendment or any other provision which may be offered, close at 2 o'clock, and that on any amendment which may be offered after that no one shall speak longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it is not going to be necessary for the Senator to put any time limit in the agreement. In my opinion, if we do not vote on the amendment to-night we will vote on it at an early hour to-morrow, and I am anxious to have an early vote on it. I do not think there is going to be prolonged debate. I think the Senator will find that we will be ready to vote earlier than the hour he has suggested. It is not going to be necessary to limit debate on the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am very anxious to go along, if I possibly can, with the consent arrangement of the Senator from Mississippi, but I myself would like to speak about three-quarters of an hour or an hour.

The only reason why I want to speak on the question is because the people of my State are vitally interested in it and have asked that I speak on it. I want to accommodate myself in every way I can to facilitate matters, but I do not want to agree to something and be frozen out, so that I can not state what I think is the viewpoint of my people.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator like to speak to-night?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator knows that I spoke for two hours last night, and that I spoke a little while to-day, and I would not like to go on to-night.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator this question: Could we get an agreement that no Senator shall speak longer on any amendment or on the provision itself than 30 minutes?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that if the Senator would make his proposition in this form—to close the debate and have a vote, say, at 2 o'clock to-morrow, or at 3 o'clock, whatever time is satisfactory, and that each Senator who wants to speak not to speak over 30 minutes or three-quarters of an hour, or, if he does not want to fix the time, that he would say that no Senator shall speak over three-quarters of an hour on the proposition—that will give me a reasonable chance to present the viewpoint I want to express, and I certainly will do my utmost to cut my remarks to the bone in the interest of the economy of time.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I ask unanimous consent that we vote at not later than 2 o'clock to-morrow on this amendment or on any other amendment which may be offered to the bill.

Mr. WATSON. What does the Senator propose that we do to-night?

Mr. HARRISON. I think we might go on, or if Senators want to adjourn, we might adjourn.

Mr. WATSON. In view of the conditions that confront us in this country, does the Senator think we ought to adjourn now? It seems to me we ought to go on.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator from Indiana that it is stated by some of those who are in favor of this legislation that there can not be a vote taken to-night and that there will not be a vote taken before to-morrow, about 1.30 or 2 o'clock. It was merely to make the time of voting certain so that Senators might adjust themselves to the uncertainties of the situation that I offered the suggestion.

Mr. LONG. I will object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LONG. I would like to tell the Senate why I object. We are not going to lose any time if we go ahead with this proposition to-night. We have had two of these night sessions, and we might as well have a night session to-night, and to-morrow night, and the next night——

Mr. SMOOT. Until the bill passes.

Mr. LONG. And get through with these tariff items. Whether anyone wants to be here and listen to speeches or not, is all right. I came back last night and listened to the Senator from Maryland, and somebody else might come back to-night.

Mr. WATSON. Or not go away. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Or not go away.

Mr. HARRISON. If we do not get unanimous consent, we shall have to go on to-night. I withdraw my request.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I certainly want to go on to-night just as much as anybody does. However, I do want to point out that if we could agree—and, representing the opposition, I will do my utmost to agree—on some hour to-morrow, I say to my friend from Louisiana that, in my judgment, the advantage is all with him, and we will vote that much more quickly and have it over with. I want to do that, because he wants it done.

May I therefore propose this agreement, that the debate on this entire section dealing with oil close at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, and that the time intervening between now and 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon be divided equally between those for and against any of the amendments; that no Senator shall speak longer than a half hour or more than once upon the section; and that after 3 o'clock, if subsequent amendments thereto are offered, no Senator shall speak longer than 10 minutes on any amendment?

That is certainly fair to the Senator from Louisiana, and I am trying to make this agreement to favor him in every way I can.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the reason why I object to this, may I say, is this——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator objects.

Mr. LONG. We are not going to gain any time by limiting debate and dividing the time up. I think we shall probably reach a vote on this matter earlier than the time suggested. I have not had a chance to confer with the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Oklahoma, but I think I can soon show them why we have no reason for waiting beyond to-night for a vote on this section.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I want to propose a unanimous-consent request that from now on no Senator shall speak more than 30 minutes on the pending amendment, or on any amendment thereto.

Mr. LONG. I object to that, for the reason that some of the Senators have already made their two and three hour speeches, and it is not fair to cut out the others.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I express the desire to withdraw that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his amendment. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to discuss this matter. I thought the Senator from Oklahoma had risen to discuss it. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. REED. It occurs to me that it would be of advantage to have the yeas and nays ordered on this amendment at this time. Would the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 243, line 3, in the committee amendment, the Senator from Nebraska moves to strike out "one-half cent" and to insert in lieu thereof "one-quarter mill," so as to read:

Crude pertoleum, one-quarter mill per gallon.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. All the Senator from Pennsylvania wants, as I understand it, is to have it agreed that when we vote on this amendment we shall have the yeas and nays—not to vote on it now. I hope I understand the Senator correctly.

Mr. REED. That is exactly it. Some of the Senators present might want to go downstairs for dinner, and they would do it with more assurance if they knew there was to be a roll call when the amendment was voted on.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this is a revenue bill; it is not a tariff bill. On former occasions some of us have taken time to discuss this item from a tariff standpoint. It is not now before this body as a tariff item. If it were, we certainly would not be discussing it from the standpoint of one-half a cent per gallon. We would not be discussing this item from the standpoint of even 1 cent per gallon. The record shows that there is a differential between the cost of producing oil in this country and abroad of more than a dollar per barrel. If we were discussing this matter from the standpoint of tariff, we would certainly ask a full consideration of the differential. That is the historic policy of the party to which I owe allegiance. The Democratic Party is not now and has not been a free-trade party.

In the early days the Democratic Party stood for a tariff for revenue only. To-day the party stands for a tariff to make up the difference between the cost of producing an article at home and the cost of producing similar articles abroad. The Houston convention so declared in 1928. Were this a tariff item, and, being a Democrat, were I presenting it from the Democratic standpoint, I certainly would present it on that basis, asking for the full differential of $1 per barrel.

Mr. President, I read from some of the pronouncements and platforms of the Democratic Party as a justification for asking for this revenue upon this meager basis of 1 cent per gallon.

I advised the Senate two years ago what would happen, in my judgment, if some protection was not given oil. My prophecy, unfortunately, has come true. In the last year oil has sold in the central part of the United States for as low as 5 cents a barrel. In some sections it has sold for 10 cents a barrel, and in my State much oil has been sold for as low as 18 cents a barrel. Yet when we drove to a filling station and asked for gasoline, we had to pay from 16 to 20 cents a gallon, when the oil was selling for even below that price per barrel.

The suggestion has been made that if we increased the price of oil gasoline would necessarily increase in price. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska knows that the price of bread does not come down when the price of wheat comes down. Only a few years ago wheat was selling at $1.50 a bushel, and bread was selling for something like 10 cents a loaf. Now wheat is selling at below 30 cents a bushel, and still bread is selling for 10 cents a loaf. There is just as much relation between the price of bread and the price of wheat as there is relation between the price of gasoline and the price of crude oil.

In 1876 the Democratic Party in its platform declared as follows:

We demand that all customhouse taxation shall be only for revenue.

In 1888 the Democratic Party in its platform declared as follows:

A fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor.

In 1896 the Democratic Party declared as follows:

We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue.

In 1920 the Democratic Party declared as follows:

We reaffirm the traditional policy of the Democratic Party in favor of a tariff for revenue only.

At New York in 1924 and at Houston in 1928 the Democratic Party changed its platform declarations from a tariff-for-revenue-only to a competitive tariff, and now my party stands before the country for a tariff sufficiently high and sufficiently low to make up the difference in the cost of producing an article in the United States and a comparable article abroad. The platform declaration at Houston was as follows:

Duties that will permit effective competition, insure against monopoly, and at the same time produce a fair revenue for the support of the Government.

Mr. President, this bill is intended to be a revenue-producing measure. If it is not a revenue-producing measure it has no place in the Senate of the United States. Its sole purpose is to raise money to reimburse the Treasury, first, for the deficit that exists there; and, second, to help bear the burdens of the Government. Unfortunately we find ourselves in possession of a $4,000,000,000 Government with only a $2,000,000,000 income. The problem before the Congress is to balance these two figures. It can only be done by two forms of procedure: First, to reduce the expenses of government on the one hand; and, second, to increase the revenue on the other hand. Either of these proposals is hard to accomplish. It is difficult to reduce the expenses of government. Fixed charges are with us. We can not reduce the interest upon bonded indebtedness. We can not reduce the compensation due the soldiers. We can not reduce the amount due on pensions. There are only a few places where it is possible to reduce the expenses of national government. An honest effort is being made to find those places and to bring in an economy bill that will reduce materially the expenses of government.

On the other hand, we are trying to increase revenues. Whence will we get those revenues? Some might say we will get such revenues from income taxes, but under the law, without the individuals earn money and receive incomes, they are not legally liable to pay income taxes. The people of the country must have incomes before they can be taxed on those incomes. At the present time but relatively few people are making any incomes to speak of, and because they are not making incomes the income taxes are now exceedingly small. I prophesy that the income taxes next year will be much less than they are now. Income taxes have almost faded away. They will be less next year than they have been this year and much less than they were last year.

On the other hand, take corporations, for illustration. Unless corporations make money they are not obligated to pay corporation taxes. They are paying a certain percentage of tax upon their net incomes at the present time. Unless the people make money they are not going to pay income taxes. Unless the corporations make money they likewise will pay no corporation tax. At the present time the incomes of the people are practically nothing. At the present time the incomes of the corporations have dwindled. From those two great sources, income tax and corporation tax, I fear that next year our revenues will be exceedingly small.

The oil item in the bill is not predicated upon the theory of a protective tariff tax. It is predicated upon the theory solely of revenue, and the item has been fixed so low as not to interfere with or prevent the continuing importation of oil.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would it be an interruption to the Senator, while talking about excise taxes, for me to call attention to the fact that all of the excise taxes levied in the bill are taxes on the privilege of doing something, for instance, on the sale of an article, on the privilege of attending a moving-picture show. Why is it not just as consistent to levy an excise tax on the privilege of selling in this country oil from other countries as it is to place a tax or excise tax on the other privileges which we are putting upon the backs of our own people?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I agree with the statement of the Senator from Texas entirely. Unless the trend changes the bill will probably not raise very much revenue. I regret to know that times are not better to-day than they were last week. I regret to know that the business tendency and trend is downward. Instead of times getting better, times are getting worse. I exhibit to the Senate a chart taken from the New York Times. This chart shows a gradual downward tendency, a gradual downward trend. Times were worse last week than they were the week before. I hope the trend will turn this week, but until we see the figures we can not tell. So far as the record is concerned, times are getting worse, prices are falling lower, and that means that people are making less money and that likewise means that corporations are making less money.

I desire to read one or two statements from the New York Times of May 15. That is the most recent Sunday issue:

> The New York Times weekly business index is at a new low level.

Again said the Times:

> Bank failures were cut down very sharply in March, though there was an increase last month, in April.

The record is that during March bank failures for the time being were checked somewhat. That came about through the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. But during the month of April bank failures started to increase again. I do not know whether bank failures are increasing now or not, but here is the record for the month of April.

Again said the Times:

> There is still complaint, however, that proper accommodation at the banks is still difficult to obtain. The reply of the bankers is that safe loans are scarce.

I am calling these facts to the attention of the Senate and, through the RECORD, to the attention of the country in an effort to show that next year corporation taxes are going to produce less than they did last year. Next year income taxes will produce less than they did last year. What does that mean? It means that Congress must find sources somewhere from which to raise money by taxation to support the Government. Here we have found a source for taxation which as yet has not been touched; we have 100,000,000 barrels of imported oil; oil produced in foreign lands by the cheapest labor in the world; oil produced from cheap leases and by cheap machinery purchased in foreign countries, on which no tariff was paid. This foreign oil is brought to the United States in tankers at a low cost of transportation and delivered to the Atlantic seaboard for $1 less in price than the oil can be produced in the United States. Yet when we see 100,000,000 barrels of this foreign oil coming from Venezuela, produced with cheap labor and material and delivered on the American coast for $1 less per barrel than it can be produced here, we find objections in the Senate to the taxing of such foreign oil.

When the tariff act was passed during the Seventy-first Congress the bill contained an item directing the Tariff Commission to make an investigation of the cost of producing oil in the mid-continent field and the cost of producing oil in Venezuela. I exhibit a copy of that report. It is Senate Document No. 267. I read from page 1 of this report, as follows:

> The average cost of production of crude petroleum at the well, for 1927, 1928, and 1929, in the States of Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, Louisiana, and New Mexico, from which States is obtained the great bulk of the domestic oil refined along the Atlantic seaboard, was $1.10. The cost of transporting this oil to the Atlantic seaboard was 88 cents, including pipe-line charges to Gulf ports, a purchasing charge of 10 cents per barrel, and tanker charges from Gulf ports to the Atlantic seaboard. The total cost of the oil delivered at Atlantic seaboard was, therefore, $1.98 per barrel. This cost is computed on the basis of "company interest oil," i. e., royalty oil has not been included in total production, and includes interest at 6 per cent on the investment of the companies.
> The cost of production of oil in the Maracaibo Basin of Venezuela, in 1929 (section 332 (f) calls for "present" cost and 1929 is the latest year for which costs were available), was 56 cents at the point of transfer to ocean tankers. Transportation and other charges necessary to deliver the oil to the Atlantic seaboard were 23 cents, making a total of 79 cents, cost delivered at Atlantic seaboard refineries. This figure also is computed on the basis of company interest oil and includes interest at 6 per cent on the investment of the companies.

These are the figures given by the Tariff Commission in response to a requirement of law. It costs $1.98 a barrel to produce oil in the mid-continent field and transport it to the Atlantic seaboard. On the other hand, companies can produce oil in Venezuela, transport it to the Atlantic seaboard, and deliver it there at 79 cents per barrel. The differential on account of cost of production is more than $1 per barrel and the differential is in favor of the importing companies.

Mr. President, I now call attention to another report, a more recent one. During the closing days of the last Congress the House of Representatives adopted a resolution calling upon the Tariff Commission to make a second investigation and report. The resolution was adopted, and the Tariff Commission, in obedience to it, submitted a report, being House Document No. 195 of the Seventy-second Congress. I read just one or two paragraphs from that report as found on page 2:

> The average cost of the domestic crude petroleum, weighted by the method stated, for the four years 1927–1930, including delivery to Atlantic coast refineries, was $1.90 per barrel. The principal items in this total are $1.09 for costs of production at the well (including interest at 6 per cent on the investment of the companies and including depletion), a purchasing commission averaging $0.04 per barrel, pipe-line charges principally from the wells in the Mid-Continent-Gulf region to Gulf ports amounting to $0.49 per barrel, and tanker charges from Gulf ports to the Atlantic seaboard averaging $0.26½ per barrel. Domestic costs have been compared first with costs (a) for the Maracaibo Basin and (b) for all the foreign countries including the Maracaibo Basin.
> (a) The average cost of production in the Maracaibo Basin of Venezuela, including local pipe-line and lake transportation to the point of transfer to ocean tankers, for this same 4-year period, was $0.62 per barrel; tanker charges to the Atlantic seaboard of the United States averaged $0.25, making a total delivered cost of $0.87 per barrel.
> The excess of domestic cost over the cost of the Maracaibo Basin oil, unadjusted for difference in yields from the two crudes, was thus $1.03 per barrel.

In the first report the difference was placed at $1.01 per barrel, while in the second report the difference is given as $1.03 per barrel. So, to make it simple, we will say it is just $1 per barrel.

Hence, Mr. President, if the proponents of this legislation were asking for tariff protection, they certainly would ask for a rate representing the difference in the cost of producing oil in Venezuela and delivering it to the Atlantic seaboard and the cost of producing similar oil in the western part of the country, in the States I have just mentioned, and likewise delivering it to the Atlantic seaboard.

There has been some controversy as to how much oil comes into this country and whether or not the rate proposed would raise revenue. In the report submitted by the Tariff Commission, in response to the House resolution on page 112, I find the following figures: It gives the total of imported oil from all countries for the years 1927 to 1931, inclusive. There were imported from all countries in 1927 71,663,820 barrels; in the year 1928 there were imported from all countries 91,466,880 barrels; in 1929 there were imported from all countries 108,564,937 barrels; in 1930 there were imported from all countries 105,510,409 barrels, and for the first seven months of 1931 there were imported 51,752,315 barrels. Later figures show that during 1931 there were imported more than 86,000,000 barrels of oil. The average imports of oil per year is something like 100,000,000 barrels.

If we should place an embargo upon the importation of oil of course we would stop this 100,000,000 barrels coming in, but this amendment does not seek to establish such an embargo. It seeks only to place the rate at such a figure that it will allow the oil to come in, but when it comes in, if this amendment shall prevail, the imported oil will have to pay a tariff of 42 cents per barrel; and if 100,000,000 barrels come in next year under this amendment, and the rate is fixed at 42 cents per barrel, a hundred million barrels will bring into the Treasury the sum of $42,000,000 in revenue.

The chairman of the committee stated that at half a cent per gallon the tax will bring into the Treasury something like $21,000,000. If we double that rate, and make it 1 cent per gallon, or 42 cents per barrel, it will bring something like $42,000,000. That tallies with the figures I have just given. So I think it can not be said accurately that this amendment will not produce revenue.

Of course, if we have a tax of only 42 cents a barrel on oil, the Atlantic seaboard can still get oil from Venezuela for something like 58 cents less than it can get it from the Kansas field or from the Louisiana field or from the Texas field, or from any other field in the Central West. So that my conviction, Mr. President, is that if this amendment should be adopted, increasing the tax on oil to 42 cents per barrel, or 1 cent per gallon, which is 42 cents per barrel, it will not interfere with and will not stop the importation of oil. It might do so to some slight extent; I am not prepared to say that it would not cut off some oil; but it certainly will not reduce the imports materially, and as 105,000,000 barrels came in in 1929 and over 100,000,000 barrels came in in 1930, if this amendment should be adopted there will still be imported into this country approximately 100,000,000 barrels per year. There is good reason for such imports, because the large oil companies can still get oil in Venezuela cheaper than it can be produced any place in the United States and delivered at the Atlantic seaboard. So 42 cents a barrel will not be an embargo; it will still permit the oil to come in; but when it comes in it will pay a tax of 42 cents per barrel. The figures of the distinguished chairman of the committee showing revenue amounting to $21,000,000 per year at the rate of one-half cent per gallon, which would mean $42,000,000 a year at the rate of 1 cent per gallon, are reasonable, and I confidently expect if this amendment shall be adopted that imports will still come in at approximately 100,000,000 barrels per year, bringing into the Treasury approximately $40,000,000 annually.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I desire to insert in the RECORD an article that appeared in the Commonweal. The magazine in which the article appears is dated May 4, 1932, and the article is entitled "Our Southwestern Problem." It is by Bishop Francis C. Kelley, of Oklahoma City. The article relates to the production of oil and the difficulties facing the oil industry, especially in Oklahoma.

Bishop Kelley is an honored and respected citizen and resident of Oklahoma City. He lives in the very shadow of not hundreds but of thousands of oil wells.

Few people—

Says Bishop Kelley—

living outside the Southwest and California realize the importance of the petroleum industry to these United States.

* * * * * * *

The buying power of the whole Southwest is wounded—butchered to make a London holiday. How bring back prosperity when a fifth of the country is unnecessarily hungry?

In justification of the publication of an article on an economic question Bishop Kelley says:

Of course it may seem a bit odd that a bishop should go out of his ecclesiastical track to write about a tariff on oil; but there is always a reason when any odd thing happens, and this time it is not one reason but many reasons that draw me out. Bishops have the care of the church on their souls and on their shoulders. It is never a light weight. To-day it is back-breaking everywhere but especially so in the Southwest. Following the drought came the oil problem. The drought hurt, but rain came again. For the oil problem there seems poor promise of relief. The eastern and northern manufacturers object to the Golden Rule. They want to be protected but not to extend protection. So my reasons for speaking out are hungry children, closed churches, overburdened congregations, penury, and want where they need not be.

I ask unanimous consent to print the article in the RECORD in full at this point in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALCOTT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

OUR SOUTHWESTERN PROBLEM

By Francis C. Kelley

Problems are like sheep. They follow the bellwether and there is no stopping them when the run begins. When the run of unemployment started in Europe it was a certainty that it would soon influence America. Now we have it, with the countless problems it has stampeded. The depression is not a single problem but a flock. It has to be studied according to the different kinds of sheep in it—steel and wool, furniture and railroads, textiles, shoes, wheat, oil, and the longtailed, etc. Prosperity will return when we manage to get most of the sheep into green pastures again.

Few people living outside the Southwest and California realize the importance of the petroleum industry to these United States. To most of them oil is just "liquid gold" flowing into the treasuries of a few millionaires. That oil has made millionaires is quite true; but it is also true that its profits have been the chief sources of those great private benefactions so peculiar to our Nation and so useful to a country that in less than two centuries had to cut its future out of a primeval forest. Not even gold has been so widely—but not wildly—generous in scattering its benefits. But that, while true enough, is not the point. Under normal conditions the petroleum industry employs approximately 2,000,000 persons, and not all—or even nearly all—where the "liquid gold" is found. Its benefits to labor go as far as the crossroads of every State in the Union, for the streams reach the streets of the cities, the country highways, and the byways even of the woods. One-fifth of the Nation's population—the oil-producing States west of the Mississippi with their 22,000,000 people—depend on oil for a goodly part of their prosperity.

The oil-producing States are not, as a rule, competitors of the manufacturing States. Though Oklahoma, for example, is a great cotton-growing State, it has but one small cotton mill. It makes no shoes and has no great steel plants. Its factories are few and quite unable to supply a hundredth part of the needs of its people in clothing, building materials, even foods, though the Southwest is rich in cattle, grain, lead, zinc, gypsum, marble, aluminum, etc. It is satisfied to live and let live, and its mineral wealth is still mostly in the ground. "Big business" with South America is keeping our zinc, lead, bauxite, and textiles there. Now our petroleum industry is threatened from the same quarter. The buying power of the whole Southwest is wounded—butchered to make a London holiday. How bring back prosperity when a fifth of the country is unnecessarily hungry?

The situation is all the more miserable when the fact is considered that the Southwest gets only a small part of even the profits of its oil industry. It receives the pay for labor at the well but not the dividends. The Southwest is a meal ticket for millions who never saw it and never will see it. Few of those who have got rich out of petroleum live "under the derrick." They profit at long distance. A steady stream of dividends has kept flowing to the North and East ever since oil was first found in the Southwest. But the bed of the profit stream is dry now, not because there is no more oil to wet it but because, in foreign ships, foreign petroleum is being dumped into the largest American petroleum market, that of the Atlantic coast. The tariff gates are wide open, for there is no duty on petroleum, crude or refined. It can be produced by South American or Russian labor cheaper than we, who bear the tax burdens of the producing States and pay American wages for American work, can produce and deliver it.

Americans who drive their cars into most of the gas stations east of the Alleghenies may be about 80 per cent certain that they are filling up on a petroleum product out of which no American except the station attendant and the owners of foreign oil lands have profited. The largest part of the largest petroleum market in the world (our country consumes 72 per cent of all the petroleum in the world) is now supplied by the foreign pools and by foreign labor working for American and British owned companies who exploit Venezuelan and Mexican fields.

The situation would be funny if it were not for the suffering it is causing—funny as an exhibition of gross stupidity and utter lack of reasoning. We are a Nation of protectionists. Every industry in the North and East is protected by a tariff. Why? To keep the prices at such a level as will enable us to hold up our standards of living. We of the Southwest pay others for the goods that we could make for ourselves and thus we do our share for the general good. The Republican Party has always been the leader in advocating protection, often even in excess of requirements, yet that party had every opportunity to apply the logic of facts to the petroleum situation and did not. The American people are patriotic enough on feast days, but in this petroleum matter, which is a day-by-day misery, they are patriotic for Venezuela, Mexico, and, in a smaller but growing degree, for Russia. To make the grim humor of the situation more apparent, one of the great importing interests now informs its stockholders that for the present there will be no dividends so that there may be plenty of money to buy up the independent companies that this strange, illogical policy is sure to bring to ruin. Yet it was those same independents who took the greatest risks in discovering and drilling, and thus gave us the oil industry as we have it. Now foreign importers use the free list to break them. Once broken, the American fields will be shut in for the most part. The purchasing power of one-fifth of the population of the United States is already cut in half. That one-fifth, in desperation, may have to manufacture what it needs to take care of its home labor; and New York, New England, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Michigan will wonder what's the matter with the "rubes" who won't buy their goods. They don't buy them for the simple reason that they can't.

The troubles of the railroads are being handed around most generously to-day and to the rich and poor alike. (I have seen the tracks of some lines torn up and scrapped in Oklahoma.) Why? I can not give all the reasons but I can point out one at least—the petroleum situation. If the Southwest can not buy of the North and East, how are the railroads to make transportation pay? If the Southwest must give up its distant home markets, how—but fill the rest in yourself. Yet it was the railroads that made industrial America, a fact we have been ignobly forgetting. The difference between North and South America in the distribution of population is largely the difference between railroads and revolutions.

The independent American petroleum producers ask protection for an American industry supplying an American market by the imposition of an adequate duty on petroleum and its products, or an excise tax that would amount to about the same thing. Even that would not give the American producer equality in costs with foreign oil. It would help, however, and allow the American Government a revenue estimated at well over $50,000,000 a year when that revenue is sadly needed. The American producer is not asking equality. He only asks not to be discriminated against.

Of course, it may seem a bit odd that a bishop should go out of his ecclesiastical track to write about a tariff on oil; but there is always a reason when any odd thing happens, and this time it is not one reason but many reasons that draw me out. Bishops have the care of the church on their souls and on their shoulders. It is never a light weight. To-day it is back-breaking everywhere, but especially so in the Southwest. Following the drought came the oil problem. The drought hurt, but rain came again. For the oil problem there seems poor promise of relief. The eastern and northern manufactures object to the Golden Rule. They want to be protected but not to extend protection. So my reasons for speaking out are hungry children, closed churches, overburdened congregations, penury, and want where they need not be. We can take the inevitable with resignation to the inevitable; but no one in the Southwest, which has spread its wealth over the whole country in the form of dividends, interest, payments on purchases, and noble benefactions, can afford to keep silence on a wrong that good sense, good logic, and good will could so justly and so easily set right.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, when this question was before the Congress on a former occasion we did not have the information upon which we could predicate arguments that would satisfy and convince. Questions were asked to which no answers could be given that were convincing. Since that discussion took place in connection with the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill we have had two investigations made, and we now have the reports before this body of those investigations, the report submitted in answer to the Senate resolution, and likewise the report submitted in answer to the House resolution. No one questions the facts which have been assembled. They are now official; they are a part of the records of the Congress and of the Government. We know the quantity of oil that comes into the country; we know whence this oil comes; we know what it cost to produce it abroad; and the facts are all in favor of this small excise tax upon its importation.

The argument was made a few years ago that those who were producing oil had done little, if anything, to protect the production of oil. It is true that the oil fields were unregulated. We had oil wells in some of the fields producing 20,000 barrels per day; others producing 30,000, 40,000, and as high as 60,000 barrels a day. When an oil field is discovered the first production runs at those enormous figures, but ordinarily not for long. As soon as the surplus or the high-pressure oil is taken from the ground, as soon as the gas has a chance to escape, oil wells settle; very soon they have to be pumped; the more they are pumped, of course, the less they produce, and after a time the wells settle down to a very low production, sometimes as low as 1 barrel per day per well.

In my State we have what is known as proration laws. Those laws were passed many years ago, and they have served a good purpose. Under those laws the corporation commission has the power to go into a field and to establish rules and regulations and has the power to enforce such rules and regulations.

Only a few days ago the supreme court of my State sustained the proration law of Oklahoma. So, unless the decision of the supreme court is overturned, it is the law in Oklahoma that the corporation commission can enforce the proration law and can make rules and regulations governing the production of oil.

In the Oklahoma City field the oil producers are limited to something like 2 per cent of the possible production of oil. They produce all that they are allowed to produce. It is only 2 per cent of the amount they could produce. The same thing is true of the east Texas field. There is a limitation there now to 2 per cent of the possible production of that field. Yet those American citizens who have invested their money in those oil fields and those oil wells, and American laborers there, are limited to 2 per cent of their time, 2 per cent of their possible production, when every day when they read their newspapers they see records of a flood of cheap oil coming into America from Venezuela. If something could be done to give these oil producers the benefit of the American market, competition would take care of the price.

This amendment will produce revenue, and this is a revenue-raising bill. I can not understand why Senators would object to taxing a commodity, which is now untaxed, which will assuredly raise such a considerable revenue. Here is 100,000,000 barrels of oil coming in, with $1 differential. In other words, this 100,000,000 barrels of oil can be produced abroad for a dollar a barrel less than it could be produced in this country. The importers have that $1 to play on, and if we tax them 42 cents, they will still have 58 cents differential in favor of the foreign oil. So it is my contention that this amendment, if carried, will not materially limit the amount of oil coming in.

I am not a high-tariff man. I have never advocated high tariff rates, and, on the contrary, have consistently opposed excessive rates. Our Republican friends support the policy that the rates should be high, so as to afford real protection to the producers in this country. The Democratic position is for a tariff for revenue, or for a competitive tariff. While we have this tariff system with us, I am in favor of equalizing the burdens and benefits of the system. I am opposed to giving New England all the benefits, and then to force the burdens of such system upon the people who reside in my section of the country.

Mr. President, such a system can not become and remain the settled policy of this country.

Mr. LONG obtained the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LONG. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashhurst	Costigan	Lewis	Shortridge
Austin	Cutting	Logan	Smith
Bankhead	Davis	Long	Smoot
Barbour	Dill	McGill	Steiwer
Barkley	Fess	McNary	Stephens

Bratton	George	Neely	Townsend
Brookhart	Hale	Norbeck	Trammell
Broussard	Harrison	Norris	Tydings
Bulkley	Hatfield	Nye	Vandenberg
Bulow	Hayden	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Hebert	Pittman	Watson
Carey	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Cohen	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White
Connally	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Coolidge	King	Sheppard
Copeland	La Follette	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate will meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I desire to ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock a vote be taken upon all amendments which may be offered to the amendment under discussion, and the amendment itself without any further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I have not had an opportunity to talk to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] about this matter, and I yield to him now. I ask the Senator what his idea is about it?

Mr. HATFIELD. I have no particular suggestion to make.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The suggestion that is made by the Senator from Utah is one that is quite impossible, I think, in the present situation. I think it must be phrased otherwise in order to accomplish the result he desires, to which I personally have no objection.

At the present time pending is one amendment, that of the Senator from Nebraska. Immediately following action on that amendment, if it shall be defeated, will be the amendment of the Senator from Texas, revising all of the rates of the particular paragraph under discussion. That amendment is not yet before us. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock to-morrow upon all the amendments pending and to be offered we shall vote and vote upon the particular provision itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me modify the unanimous-consent request. The Senate meeting at 11 to-morrow, I ask that between 12 and 2 o'clock, on all amendments that may be offered, the discussion be limited to not exceed 10 minutes on the part of any Senator, and that at 2 o'clock we vote upon the amendment pending.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the Senator from Utah was not present when the Senator from Maryland made his statement some time since. I shall be delighted to hear the Senator from Maryland, and he wanted a considerable period of time in which to express his views.

At 2 o'clock, if that be satisfactory to the Senator from Maryland, who is anxious to be heard in this matter, we may vote upon the pending amendment. Thereafter amendments may be offered, of course, to the particular part of the bill that is under discussion. I suggest to the Senator, so far as I am personally concerned—and I do not presume to speak for anyone else—that we limit debate to 10 minutes thereafter upon such amendments as may be presented and then continue the voting until the matter shall be disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. And limit speeches on amendments to 10 minutes after 2 o'clock.

Mr JOHNSON. Yes; upon other amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; all amendments which may be offered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether he would not be so kind as to incorporate in his request the statement that the time shall be equally divided between those who wish to speak for and against the proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. The difficulty with that, let me say to the Senator, is this: Who is to utilize the time first? Secondly, who is to parcel out the time? We would get into all kinds of difficulties with that sort of an arrangement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I yield to myself just a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. LONG. I was going to make a suggestion, because I am speaking for several Senators who are in favor of this tariff item. We probably could make this arrangement: Let us go along on this matter until to-morrow morning, and I think that to-morrow morning we will be in a position to make an agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. At 11 o'clock, the Senator means?

Mr. LONG. I do not mean that we should take a recess now, but I mean that I think that to-morrow morning we will be in a position to agree to vote by, say, 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state the unanimous-consent request. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock to-morrow a vote be taken on the pending amendment, and that after 2 o'clock debate be limited on each amendment to not longer than 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. That is, for each Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ten minutes for each Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall have to object to that. I would not object to a limitation on debate, but I will object to an agreement to vote at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

UNDERTAKING TO REMAIN UNDER AN ADMIRED LEADERSHIP

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, at this time what we are debating is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has withdrawn his amendment, and we are now debating the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska which proposes in effect to wipe out what the committee has done and to substitute practically no tariff at all on oil. I am hoping that I shall be able to persuade the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw the amendment. I say that in a charitable spirit. I have undertaken since I came to this body to find myself a leader, because in all parliamentary service it is well known that for any man to be properly identified and accomplish results he must have a leader. After having traveled about in the Senate for some time and announced several leaders, I have at last landed and announced myself firmly affixed to the Senator from Nebraska as the leader of whatever faction I belong to, regardless of number. [Laughter.] I am hoping that I can convince and persuade the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw the amendment and not leave me leaderless by to-morrow again in this body.

I do not think the Senator from Nebraska is at all informed on some of the matters that are affected by the amendment which he has offered. I know that the Senator has not had the experience he would have had if he had mingled with the sections of the country with which I am familiar. I know that he has not such knowledge, or in my opinion he could not have entertained any such view as is suggested by the amendment which he has offered here this afternoon.

I do not know how many tariff items the Senator from Nebraska has voted for since he has been in Congress or whether he ever voted for a tariff on any article. I have been told by my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in a caucus that he does not know of any man sitting in the Congress to-day who has not at one time or another voted for a tariff on something. He might have been mistaken about some of the gentlemen from some of the Western States, but in a Democratic caucus—I am sure the Senator will not feel I am revealing any confidential statement that has been made—I remember the Senator from Texas having stated that he would like to see any man in Congress who had not at one time or the other voted for some tariff on something.

As a result of that policy, we live in a tariff world. We have a tariff on the manufactured products from New England. We have a tariff on wool. We have a tariff on practically everything that is manufactured in America; and now we come down asking for a tariff on oil.

Here is a fact: This country has no shortage in its supply of oil!

Here are some other facts: This is the only country where oil is produced to amount to anything where the supply is not monopolized. America is the only oil-producing country where the oil supply is not practically a monopoly. We have hundreds of thousands of farmers in the country who are interested in the oil business. We have any number of ordinary business men who are interested in the oil business. I do not mean that they are merely interested as the result of their stock ownership, but I mean that there are many of them—and I have been one—who are interested in the production of oil in this country. There are thousands of them.

The Tariff Commission says that there is a difference of $1.03 in the cost of producing a barrel of oil in the South and Central American countries as compared with the cost of producing a barrel of oil in the United States. I believe that is the correct figure. That is the report of the Tariff Commission.

Now I am going to disagree to some extent with some of the statements that have been made, even by my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I do not think there is going to be anything like a reasonable restriction of foreign oil imported into this country as a result of the tariff that is proposed in his amendment. It is entirely too low. It is only 21 cents per barrel. It still allows discrimination in favor of foreign oil of 82 cents per barrel. They still can pay the tariff of 21 cents authorized under the Senate committee amendment and have 82 cents discrimination in the cost of producing a barrel of oil in the countries of Venezuela and Colombia as compared with the cost of producing that same barrel of oil in Louisiana, Oklahoma, Kansas, Kentucky, or other oil-producing States of this Nation.

That is only to show this fact. This is not a protective tariff at all in the practical sense of the word. My friend the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] this afternoon stated—and I am sorry some Senators who are here now did not hear what he said then—that no Democrat, such as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] [laughter], need hesitate a moment, need hesitate one iota, to vote for this tariff, because it is not a protective tariff at all. There never was a more practical revenue tariff on earth than this little sliver- ing 21 cents per barrel tariff on oil when it is produced $1.03 cheaper under the flag of the dictators of Central America than in this great land of the free. They have an advantage of 82 cents per barrel; and if there ever was a practical, sure-shot revenue tariff on earth that has not any semblance of real protection about it, it is this mere pittance of 21 cents a barrel on oil.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and of my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to something. I want to know if they are willing to penalize the school children of the State of Louisiana and of Arkansas and of Arizona and of Texas and of California as they are doing to-day by promoting this slave traffic in oil in America? Let me explain the situation. In Louisiana, Mr. President, we have a severance tax on oil. The Mississippi River divides our State in the middle. Part of our State is on the east side of the Mississippi River and part of our State is on the west side of the Mississippi River. It is a navigable river for a number of miles. It comes up from the Gulf of Mexico and is navigable as far as Chicago. I believe it has been made navigable to the Great Lakes.

Mr. LEWIS. Not yet; but we are going to make it so.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Illinois says so, it will be so. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. That is why I said so.

Mr. LONG. But as a result of navigable waters flowing through the State of Louisiana a number of oil refineries have been located along the banks of the Mississippi River. Drive down through that great country of the State of Louisiana, on the east side or west side of the Mississippi River, and one will pass by oil refinery after oil refinery. In Baton Rouge will be found probably the biggest oil refinery to be found anywhere in the world. There are several more between there and New Orleans.

Here is the criminal feature that our people are up against: These oil refineries were placed down there to refine the oil of Oklahoma, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and other States. The pipe lines have been run all the way through from the States in the Middle West leading down to the Mississippi River, feeding that oil to the refineries there on the banks of the Mississippi River, so that the navigable waters carry the crude oil to the Gulf and carry the refined products upon the navigable waters of the Mississippi River to Kansas City on the one hand and to Pittsburgh on the other. They have been refining our domestic oil.

But what happened? We needed money to support the schools of that State. We had an ad valorem tax on lands in Arkansas, Louisiana, and those States just as high as we could possibly make it. On the severing of oil from the soil we put a tax of 11 cents per barrel for the high-grade oil. What was the result?

The Oil Trust served notice on us, "We have a way to avoid this tax." We said, "The independent producers of oil are not making any objection at all to paying this oil tax." No, sir, Mr. President; some of the independent oil producers came before the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and they did the same thing in some of the other States, and said, "We have no objection whatever to paying 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 or 7 or 8 or 9 or 10 or 11 cents a barrel tax to educate the school children of these States, if you will put that tax on the Standard Oil Co. and the Gulf Refining Co. and the Texas Co." They admitted that there is no industry on earth and especially not in America that can stand a fairer tax than this severance on severing oil from the surface.

But the Oil Trust said to us, "We have ways of beating the State out of this tax. Here is what we are going to do. The independent does not own any oil supply in Mexico. The independent does not own any oil supply in Venezuela or in Colombia. The independent does not own any tank fleet. The independent not only does not own, but if he did own he could not transport foreign oil into the United States. So here is what we will do," and here is what they did to us.

They brought their trust-controlled oil from Central America to the State of Louisiana because they could bring it there and avoid the tax of 11 cents a barrel. They not only kept the State of Louisiana from realizing a dime off the oil that was there in the State—and they did the same thing in Arkansas and Texas—they not only cheated us out of revenue of millions of dollars that ought to have gone to educate the children of those States, but they have served notice on us that they will see that there is no independent oil industry and no kind of reasonable oil industry in the States that have the severance tax, "because we will go down to South America and bring this oil up from there free of cost."

What has been the result with the independent? He could not compete. There are plenty of farmers who own oil wells in that country, plenty of them; do not think it is a rich man's game altogether; there are hundreds of them, thousands of them—indeed, I would hesitate to say how many thousands of them, but probably hundreds of thousands of them who draw the royalty off those wells. But those wells can not be opened up, because if the farmer of this country, the independent oil man of this country, opens up his oil well and produces oil he has got to pay a tax to the States and Government of the United States, whereas they can bring their oil in from Mexico and Venezuela tax free, and they do not have to do anything but come up the navigable waters, which have been made navigable at the expense of the State of Texas, the State of Louisiana, the State of Arkansas, and the United States Government. They can use our navigable waters and streams, use them for no other purpose whatever than to keep the States from enjoying the taxes they need to operate the Government. Somebody will tell us that is all we have there to tax.

How fair is it? Whom is it helping? It is not helping anybody. I am sorry the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has walked out, because I certainly wanted him to hear what I am about to say. If the Senator from Maryland thinks it is doing his State any good to have nothing but a monopolistic oil business in this country, he certainly is sailing far afield.

I will state what an oil tariff will do, and I defy any man to contradict a single word I shall say as to facts or figures. I was in the oil business in 1918, being interested in several oil companies in the Pine Island oil field of the State of Louisiana, and I will tell the Senate the conditions that developed there in 1918 and 1919. I not only was interested in a private capacity, but I was elected railroad and pipe-line commissioner of the State of Louisiana at the same time.

The oil industry of the State received a notice one day that the big companies would no longer take the oil from our oil fields. That has happened, too, in California. We were producing a 28-gravity oil. Oil is graded by gravity; the higher the gravity the better the oil and the better the price. That has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in a lawsuit which was brought against my administration. We were producing 28-gravity oil in the State of Louisiana, and we had been getting $1.55 per barrel for that 28-gravity oil for many months. Just over to the east of us was another oil field which was producing a slightly heavier gravity—or really a lighter gravity—oil, because as the oil gets lighter—that is, as the gasoline content increases—the higher the gravity goes. They were producing a 36-gravity oil, for which they were getting about $2.40 per barrel. We received a notice that they would not take another barrel of our 28-gravity Pine Island crude. The Gulf coast regions of Texas and south Louisiana received about the same notice. I defy any man to dispute one single fact that I am stating. They are startling facts; but I defy any man who will take the time to look up the matter to dispute a single fact that I will give.

We received notice that they would not take any more of our oil out of that field at any price. After negotiation we finally got them to agree to take one-fifth of the oil produced. That meant that four-fifths of it had to go down the branch. They agreed to take one-fifth of the oil produced at 60 cents a barrel. That meant that for every barrel we produced we really got 12 cents, because we could only sell them 20 per cent of the production.

I hope the Senator from Nebraska will bear these figures in mind, because I am going to give further figures. I have said that they gave us notice that they would pay us 60 cents a barrel for one-fifth of the output. That meant that four-fifths of it had to go down the creek, because oil is something that can not be kept unless the producer has large storage capacity, and so whatever is not taken above the storage capacity has to go down the stream, and as they would take but 20 barrels of oil out of every hundred, and there was not the storage capacity for all the remainder, much of it had to be lost.

At the same time when they were giving that 60 cents a barrel for 28-gravity oil and taking only one-fifth of it they were not freezing out California. They got to California a little later—one at a time. At the same time they were paying us one-fifth of 60 cents for 28-gravity oil, they were paying for 16-gravity oil in California $1.80 a barrel. Those are the facts; that is the outlandish condition that continued for many months.

We had a political campaign in that section of the country as a result of it. Finally they froze us out and got the oil field which we were operating; the leases that were in my name, or, rather, in names of concerns I was interested in, are now in the name of the Standard Oil Co. or some other big company. Then that oil went up to $2 and more and one time to $3.35 per barrel.

Then they hopped over to California and did to California what they had already done to us. How did they do it? They brought their cheap, untaxed, foreign crude and congested every tank and every refinery and every market on the Gulf coast with Mexican and Venezuelan and Colombian oil, and they brought it there so cheaply that there was not a chance on earth of our doing any business at all.

They did not have to pay the State any tax; they did not have to pay the Government any tax; they used the rivers the Government had improved; they sailed their ships under the protection of the flag of this Nation; they defied the State, broke up the independent oil business, and then deliberately raised the price of domestic oil up to $3.35 a barrel after they had put the independents out of business.

While they were paying us 60 cents a barrel for our oil we were paying 25 cents a gallon for gasoline; and when they had finally frozen us out and had raised the price of some of the crude up from $2 to $3.35 a barrel, the gasoline price dropped to 14 cents a gallon. That is how the thing was worked down in that section of the country. I wonder if anybody is so innocent as to think that such things happen as a matter of accident.

Then they went over to California. I want to say that I will give any man all the time he wants to corroborate these statements. I know the figures. The condition I am relating is what caused me to go back into the practice of the law. That is why I became a lawyer; that is why I am in the United States Senate to-day. That is one of the bad effects, perhaps, that resulted from this freeze out. I went to work. I remember the figures, because I know what put me back to work. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries they must respect the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. From California we did not get much help at that time in the direction of securing an oil tariff. At that time they were satisfied. They did not see any need for a tariff on oil.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not I.

Mr. LONG. Then, I stand corrected.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was not satisfied.

Mr. LONG. I stand corrected, but we did not hear any roar from California. The big oil companies had to hop on to California. I will say to the Senator from Texas that they had already done something of the kind in Texas. However, after they had been paying California producers $1.80 a barrel when they were paying us around 60 cents and taking only one-fifth of the production, they finally hopped over to California and brought in a Venezuelan oil supply to the coast of California, and despite all that California could do, or can do now, they have practically bankrupted the oil fraternity in the State of California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I rise to remind the Senate—I need not remind the Senator from Louisiana—that I have contended for years for a tariff duty on imported oil of at least $1 per barrel, and the third bill introduced in the Senate during this session was a bill introduced by me calling for a tariff rate of $1 a barrel on imported oil and 50 per cent ad valorem on the price of certain of its by-products. I fully agree with everything the Senator from Louisiana has said.

Mr. LONG. I will ask the Senator further if he thinks there is any industry on earth that is more entitled to protection, measured by the difference in the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries, than the oil industry of America?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There is no product in America, in my judgment, more entitled to adequate protection than oil. I fully agree with the Senator's thought.

Mr. LONG. As I was saying, they hopped on to California and they flattened out the oil fraternity—one at a time. "The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small." So they hopped on to California. They hopped on to Texas. They gave Texas just a little taste of it down at Beaumont. They had not at that time started to operate full blast; they had not learned all the tricks of the trade; but they had given Texas a little taste of it at Beaumont. Texas had passed some kind of a regulatory law; but when they finally did get on to Texas, there was enough oil being produced in Texas to have supplied every man, woman, and child in the United States. The biggest oil wells in this country came in in the State of Texas and all over the State of Texas. What did they do when oil began to be discovered in Texas? Did they lessen their importations? No; they increased their importations of oil into the United States in some cases. The statistics will bear out the statement that they increased their importations in the territory where the oil fields were newly discovered until they had cornered those fields and driven the operators out of business.

The Senator from Nebraska, I presume, and also the Senator from Maryland, would say, "Well, it stands to reason that if we put a tariff on oil my people who consume oil are going to have to pay it." That would be the natural deduction to be drawn, that "If I vote for 21 cents a barrel for oil my people are going to have to pay the 21 cents." That would be true if we were talking about the manufactured products of New England; that would be true of many other commodities; but the fact is that it is not true of oil. The fact is, Mr. President, that so long as the independent oil industry continues in America the price of gasoline is always lower than when a monopoly is placed in the hands of the larger interests. The fact is that the price of crude oil has had but very little to do with the price of gasoline in the United States. And the fact is further—and I challenge anybody to dispute it, as I challenge anybody on the living face of the earth to dispute what I have said; I challenge anybody to dispute the statement that the supply of oil has had nothing to do in many periods with the price of gasoline.

If they get it from the independent refineries or from the independent oil companies as they have managed to get it lately, then the price of gasoline goes down, but when they put the independent refineries out of business, as is being done now, and as has practically been accomplished, then the price of gasoline goes back up, because the public can not use crude oil; the public can not use oil that is transported in tank cars or in pipe lines until it is refined; the public can not use the crude oil; and when they raise the price of crude here is what happens—and I hope I will have the attention of Senators a little while longer—they come in and freeze out the independent fields by congesting this country with Mexican crude and Venezuelan crude. We go to the banks, and we go to our brothers, and we go to our neighbors, and say, "We have got to put up a refinery." So we raise $250,000 and put up a refinery. I may say parenthetically, however, that that is not a drop in the bucket. It takes quite a good deal more money than that.

The cracking process has made it necessary to spend millions of dollars to build a refinery if the fullest gasoline content is to be obtained from the oil. Just as we are about to get the refinery up and to start business, they have succeeded in freezing out the independent oil fields, and they raise the price of the crude up to $3 and $4 a barrel, and then the refinery can not run. Then the independent refinery closes down, and down goes the price of crude oil again. We never have been able to catch them yet.

I will show you man after man—I will give you their names and I will give you their addresses—who owned as much as three or four thousand acres of land, upon whose land oil fields were found, producing immense quantities of oil, thousands and hundreds of thousands of barrels of oil, and those men have wound up penniless, notwithstanding the oil that was found on their lands. They froze them out, shut them down, and they wound up with absolutely nothing. I can show you man after man of whom that is true.

Consider the experience with one man. He had a lease on 10,000 acres of land. They opened up a field on certain land producing 10,000 barrels of oil a day. To-day that man is near bankruptcy but was here in Washington trying to get a refund on some income taxes to keep from having to sell his business. That is how the independent business has thrived under this system.

You think that if you keep 21 cents a barrel from being added on to the price of gasoline to perpetuate the oil monopoly in this country you are going to get the benefit of it. Have you gotten the benefit of it? In Venezuela, where they produce this cheap oil, in Colombia and in Mexico, where all this cheap oil is produced, and in the other foreign countries, they are, or were, paying twice as much for gasoline as you are to-day. Why is America buying its gasoline cheaper than Venezuela? Why are we buying gasoline in America cheaper than they are buying it in Mexico? They produce the oil in Mexico, and I think they refine some oil in those countries. Why is it that in America you pay less per gallon for gasoline than they do in those countries where they produce this cheap foreign oil? Because you have been able to keep alive an independent oil industry part of the time in America, and they have not had any independent oil industry in those foreign countries; and though they produce the cheap Venezuelan crude in Venezuela, when you pay 15 cents for a gallon of gasoline in the United States they pay maybe 30 cents a gallon or thereabouts for the same gallon of gasoline in Venezuela.

Does that mean anything? They have not any tariff in Venezuela. They have not any tax in Venezuela. They produce the oil in Venezuela. They pay no transportation cost in Venezuela; and yet, with the monopoly they have there and which they have here now unless we give that independent industry some relief, with a monopoly such as has been perfected down there, where they have been able to operate as freely as they are almost now operating in this country, the price of gasoline right at the place where it is produced and made is twice as much as it is here in this country.

We all know what keeps down the price of gasoline. One little refinery—and I hope Senators will listen to this—one little old two-by-four refinery operating up in El Dorado, Ark., has kept the price of gasoline at 13 cents in one town in Louisiana for about six years, to my certain knowledge. They have tried to put that little old refinery out of business in every way on earth, but they have not been able to do it. It has looked two or three times like the man who runs it was hanging by his eyelashes, but they have managed to get together and give him all the support they could.

I have seen gasoline selling in Baton Rouge, La., for about 25 cents a gallon when it was selling at Palmetto, La., for 13 cents; and we managed to keep that little old Palmetto price at 13 cents. They put one station on the north about three blocks away, and one station on the south about three blocks away, and one station on the left, and one station on the right, and one a mile away, and one this way, and one that way, and one the other way, and one every which way; but that station stayed right there and sold gasoline at 13 cents. As a result of the operation of that one little independent refinery, we have managed to keep the price of gasoline, including a tax of from 6 to 7 cents, down to 13 cents a gallon. They have managed to keep that little refinery running.

I do not know how long it will be able to continue to run. It can not run very much longer. It is the only one we have now to amount to anything. The independents and near independents have been practically put out of business.

How many oil-producing States have we in this country, I will ask the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator refer to the principal oil-producing States? Some five or six.

Mr. LONG. We have more than that producing oil, have we not? The principal States are Louisiana, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas, and California. How many have we?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there are about 20 States that produce oil—California, New Mexico, Kansas, Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, some in New York, some in Indiana, some in Illinois.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. At least a dozen.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There are about 20 oil-producing States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. At least 12, I should say.

Mr. LONG. There is a small quantity produced in Ohio. There is some produced in Indiana. There is some produced in Kentucky. There are about 20 States altogether. There are six or seven major States. One State may be a major oil-producing State to-day, and its production may go down to-morrow, and the next year it may come up. It fluctuates in every State; but we have about 20 States in America left in this position: Whichever one of those States does not consent practically to eliminate the oil tax altogether has facing it the alternative of Venezueland and Mexican crude supplying that line of territory, and it being unable to collect any tax at all.

I will give you a little illustration of that.

We used to get in Louisiana about $1,000,000 a year from the severance tax on oil. We got about $1,000,000 a year from the severance tax on oil, and that money went to the school children of Louisiana. As I was saying—which I do not think everybody heard—we were getting, on our severance tax, about $1,000,000 a year in Louisiana. We were getting that on our severance tax on oil. That went to the school children of Louisiana. Every dime of it went to keep open the public schools and colleges of the State. We have a large rural population, where they have practically no property at all. Their farms are very much in jeopardy. So we voted taxes there, and we gave them to the poor sections of the State principally to keep those schools open in the farm sections where they did not have any property that could be taxed that they could pay.

So I wrote a law, which the legislature passed, imposing a tax that gave us about a million dollars a year on oil; and we ran our schools, and everybody was happy in Louisiana, because in the remotest part of that State we had been able to send them funds out of the State treasury, where they did not have funds of their own, to keep those schools going nine months out of the year.

But, lo and behold, the Standard Oil Co. and all of the big oil companies paid that tax about two years, and then they served notice on me—not they, but somebody; they could say they did not do it, but it came all right, and I could give the source of my information, and I do not think they will dispute it—they served notice on me that if we were not willing to reduce that severance tax down to about 3 cents a barrel they were not going to pay us any more taxes. "Well," I said, "I should like to know how you are going to do it."

In the meantime, they paid me the tax, because they went to the Supreme Court of the United States contesting it on the ground that it was unconstitutional. They had been keeping from paying us a tax for this reason: We had made the tax on a value basis. That meant 2 or 3 per cent of value. The Oil Trust regulated the price, and they found out that there was not any use paying us 2 cents on a barrel of oil. All they had to do was to reduce the price down to 40 cents, and pay us eight-tenths of 1 cent. So I said, "Well, we will get around this thing."

So I drew a law, the first one of its kind ever drawn in the United States, making the tax so much per barrel based upon gravity. That meant that the worth of oil is gaged by its gravity, so that they could not produce a 44-gravity oil that you know is worth $3 a barrel and post a price of 75 cents and pay us a tax of half a cent instead of paying us the tax that we were entitled to, of around 9 to 11 cents. So I wrote the law that way: On 16-gravity oil, 4 cents. (I am not being accurate on these figures, but they were about like this.) On 18 to 20 gravity oil, 5 cents. On 20 to 22 gravity oil, 5½ cents; and so on up until I got to the 45-gravity oil, 11 cents a barrel.

Well, they tied up our revenues, but I borrowed from the banks with notes signed by me as chairman of the Board of Liquidation of the State of Louisiana, and I operated those schools on borrowed money. When we won the lawsuit, after about a year and a half or two years' litigation, I got back the money that had been impounded in the Federal court, and paid the loans of the State; and the schools had been operating in the meantime.

When they lost the case in the United States Supreme Court, in a decision rendered by a unanimous court here—Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court—they then served notice on me that they were not going to pay those severance taxes any more; that they were going to use our river that the farmers' taxes helped to keep in navigable condition.

The Government did not always maintain the levees and the navigability of the Mississippi River. Our State is bankrupt to-day; we have 16 levee districts that are to-day bankrupt because we kept that river navigable and kept it within its shores for many, many years before the Federal Government ever came to our relief. So they used the river that we had put in navigable condition with our money; they used our State; they used those refineries; and they brought the slave oil from Mexico and laid it down in the State of Louisiana and made it tariff free. Not only did they cheat us out of the oil that they would have produced but the independent oil man in Louisiana, where it was already costing him $1.03 more to produce a barrel of oil than it was costing in Venezuela, could not pay the State 11 cents to operate his oil wells when they were bringing it in there without paying a copper cent. That is the condition.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska half understood this thing, I do not believe he would stand for the kind of condition that we are having to stand for. We are big States. Texas is the biggest State in America. Louisiana, Kansas, and Kentucky are big States. We are a part of this Nation. This Nation does not owe any State as much as it owes the State of Louisiana, or, at least, no more. The State of Louisiana furnished some of the soldiers that whipped Santa Ana at San Jacinto. I do not know whether the Senator from Texas knows that or not; but it was the State of Louisiana that made up most of the six hundred and thirty and odd soldiers that Sam Houston had when he whipped Santa Ana at San Jacinto. He did not need 630 Louisianans. That was an army. [Laughter.]

If I may be permitted to digress just a moment—and I want the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to hear me—I came here about four months ago, and they were repairing a street out there by my office window near the Senate Office Building. They were hammering "chug chug" and "blam blam" on that plagued street, and I said, "Well, they will be through with this thing next week."

When I came back about three weeks later they were still hammering on that street, and they have been hammering outside of my window trying to pave about 425 feet, or something like that for four months. If they would let me bring 2 or 4 or 6 city-hall bums out of New Orleans, I would fix that thing for them in less than two weeks' time, instead of having to take the balance of the year. [Laughter.]

As I said, 630 people from Louisiana would be an army. That is not all that this country owes Louisiana, Mr. President. I want to tell how the people in Nebraska are underneath the umbrella the State of Louisiana put up for them, and how they are treating us now, when they are taking away the taxes we need to keep our children in school. I want to tell what they owe us.

The United States Government did not make the Mississippi River navigable. Senators may think they did, but they did not do any such thing. The people of Louisiana made the Mississippi River navigable for the United States. The people in Nebraska and California and Utah had nothing to do with it. Not only was the river found there, but the State of Louisiana gave this Nation the navigable Mississippi waters.

The proposition to make the Mississippi navigable was condemned by the Army engineers of the United States Government. They said the Mississippi River could not be made navigable, and the idea was given up. How did this Nation get that navigable river? Because one man in Louisiana by the name of Eads said, "I will undertake to make the thing navigable if I can get enough Louisianans who will work for me for near nothing, unless we succeed; I will go down there and devote my life to it and make that river navigable."

The Louisiana people contributed, and the brave, stalwart citizens of that State went down there, without getting a copper cent, not to be paid a dime unless they succeeded, and not knowing whether they would be paid a dime, whether they succeeded or not, and after months and years, with the United States Government saying it was childish folly, they gave the State of Nebraska the navigable Mississippi River, which makes it possible for them to ship their products by water down that river to-day.

With their taxes they made that river navigable; they made it possible for the people of Nebraska to ship what they raised down the river, and to bring back what they needed up the river. They made possible with their taxes the establishment of oil refineries on that river. They made it possible for this country to be developed, and it was Louisianans who did it, the money of Louisianans, and now, after we have done that, and are trying to educate the sons and daughters of those people by imposing a tax on oil, you come here and allow them to bring in the slave oil from foreign countries and penalize us, in spite of what we have done for the benefit of this country. You take out of the mouths of these children, who are going to school in that State to-day, 11 cents on every barrel of oil that was helping to educate those children, in order that they can bring foreign oil into this country and cheat that State, and the children of that State, out of the birthright which they have given to this country.

That is not all, Mr. President, the State of Louisiana gave. The State of Louisiana kept you a part of the American Union. I am going to tell you something else you do not know about Nebraska. [Laughter.] You in Nebraska would be living under the flag of England to-day if it had not been for Louisiana. There is a lot of history that has not been played up very much. We not only went over and helped to free Texas, we not only gave you your navigable river, but the State of Louisiana did more than that. The State of Louisiana is responsible for St. Louis being a part of the American Union. The State of Louisiana is responsible for that; and why? Because, Mr. President, when the War of 1812 had been fought and lost—that is what I say, when it had been fought and lost, and I will prove that it was fought and lost by the treaty of Ghent—when the War of 1812 had been fought, and the treaty had been made at Ghent, they left the land between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains out of the peace treaty, and left it without the rule of the law of nations, so that when that treaty was signed the empire of Napoleon was not recognized by the English nation. That was so that when that treaty became effective whoever had possession would retain possession.

Why did Pakenham's army locate in New Orleans? Because they were going to sign the treaty of Ghent; and when that treaty was signed, Pakenham's army, the flower of the British Army, would be in charge of the Louisiana Purchase territory, and from that day on it would have belonged to the Empire of England.

Read the letters of Andrew Jackson and his analysis, and see how indisputable those facts are. But it was the forces of the State of Louisiana which won the memorable battle of January 8, 1815, throwing the British Army into disorder, and when the treaty of Ghent reached American soil, Jackson's army was in command of New Orleans, and Nebraska was thereby kept in America [laughter] with the forces of the State of Louisiana.

Those are the real facts. Nobody helped the Louisiana troops to win the war except one company or two companies of Tennessee mounted riflemen who kept the entire Louisiana Purchase.

Now, Mr. President, I have undertaken, representing my State, to look for a leader whom my State could recognize, and whom I could follow for the welfare of my State. To whom would I look? I tried out several. [Laughter.] I indicated my willingness to take most any of them. I finally concluded that I ought to look to the wide expanse that had profited so much from the navigability of the waters of the Mississippi, which the citizens of my State had made possible, which had owed its birthright and its participation in this American Government to the fight of the Louisianans when this Territory was made a part of the American Nation and kept there, and it was only natural, with his distinguished record, and all the facts blended, that I should have chosen as my leader the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

I am not only fighting now for justice for my State, I am fighting to keep a leader, and not to lose him in this kind of a fight, with this kind of an amendment he has proposed here. I will be left leaderless if this amendment, offered by the Senator from Nebraska, should prevail. The fights of 125 years will have been lost.

Nothing is worse than a man without a leader. I am trying to understand, but I can not see how anybody can stand against allowing those people of Louisiana to tax the oil to enable them to educate their children with taxes on their own products. How could anyone? Perhaps my logic is impossible, I do not know, but I can not see how, from the standpoint of gratitude, of fairness, of right, you could take away a tax, that you could take away from the sons and daughters of those people the right to live off the land, and operate, and to share in the prosperity with the oil industry my country does give, when it is doing justice not only by this country, but it is doing justice by 19 other States, and is accommodating every man who is using gasoline and oil in this entire country.

You are doing for them what the facts will show results in giving them a reduced price on oil. You are giving them a reduction in the price of oil, because if they lived under the dominion of these foreign countries, where the oil is produced and refined on the ground, they would pay twice as much for gasoline as the citizen of the United States pays to-day, notwithstanding the fact that it costs $1.03 a barrel more to produce a barrel of oil in the United States than to produce a barrel of oil in Venezuela, Mexico, and Colombia. Notwithstanding that fact, you can buy gasoline in the United States to-day for half what you can buy it for in those foreign countries.

I appeal to my friend from Nebraska, who will have time to think this matter over and to check up my figures, to withdraw the amendment he has offered here to destroy what the Senate Finance Committee has in a chinchlike way decided to do for those people.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should be glad if the Senator in his speech would add that one member of the Finance Committee did not agree to the reduction made by the committee. I asked, indeed, for a higher rate than that accorded by the House.

Mr. LONG. And the Senator was perfectly right; he was positively right.

Mr. President, when Senators read in the RECORD and find that the people of Louisiana and Arkansas and Texas have to pay $1.03 more to produce oil than the man in Mexico and Venezuela and Colombia, they ought to be willing not only to give the State of Louisiana the benefit of a tax of $1.03 but they ought to be willing to say, "We are going to give them the best of it. They have been down there suffering from flood waters for many, many years. Their people have stood and fought as no set of people have ever fought. They have been as loyal as any men and women on the shining face of God's earth, people of the land of Evangeline, the home of hospitality, with a climate second to none—except perhaps of California." [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am willing to stipulate that Louisiana comes second in climate, California first.

Mr. LONG. That Louisiana is one of the two best. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the stipulation between the able Senator from California and the eloquent Senator from Louisiana refers to the production of oil or of gas? [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will answer that question. West Virginia produces very little oil, but plenty of gas yet. It is one of the leading gas-producing States.

Mr. NEELY. And the best gas in the world.

Mr. LONG. I agree to that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will permit me to add, West Virginia comes close in the production of gas.

Mr. LONG. It is ahead of us.

Mr. NEELY. But West Virginia's gas is under control. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will announce that there must be order on the floor of the Senate and in the galleries. If there is not order in the galleries, the Chair will order the galleries cleared. This is a final statement from the Chair on this subject. The occupants of the galleries are present under the rules of the Senate and must obey them if they are to remain here.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in this particular case I am speaking not only to the Senate but I am addressing the President of the Senate at this time, and for the President's attention and for his consideration. I believe that enough Senators are not going to make a mistake in this matter to result in injury to the people of Louisiana. I hope not.

I believe if I might convince Senators to consider the facts that I have placed before them here this evening, not the source, but the facts which I have given—if they would consider the facts instead of the source of those facts—I do not see how and I can not see why we would be left in these oil-producing States in this tariff world to the mercy and imposition of slave trade when it does not mean anything except revenue to the Government, which it needs, and a fair deal for its people, with more than likely a reduction in charges on commodities.

The President of the Senate comes from the great State of Kansas. It is a part of this American Union. The President of the Senate, as no other man in this body, has an opportunity to look at this question from a national standpoint, from a standpoint that is national, that no doubt some of us probably can not see from as wide a viewpoint as we should.

The President of the Senate knows the need of the country in not letting one part enjoy a tariff on what it produces and another part being left without such a tariff. He is interested in seeing that the school children of the States of Texas and Louisiana and Arkansas are not defrauded out of the revenue which those States are entitled to have. He understands that the only way we can keep this American country floating in a fair way is not to force the farmers of Louisiana and Kansas and Texas and the oil men of those States to live as purchasers in a tariff world and outside of the tariff world as regards whatever they have to sell or produce.

I believe if enough Members of the Senate should make the mistake of developing a tie vote on this question, that the President of the Senate will give consideration to relieving this great territory and this great country from any such inequitable situation as exists for us in a life with no tariff while everyone else has a tariff on what he produces.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I desire to consume but a few moments of the time of the Senate in discussing the question before us. I have observed from the addresses which have been made that those who have discussed the question have done so on the basis of fixing a rate of 1 cent per gallon, or 42 cents per barrel, on crude oil. While that is not the amendment immediately before us, it is likely to be, and in all probability will be the one on which we will finally be called upon to cast our votes.

I rise, Mr. President, in support of that proposition. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], in closing his remarks this evening, stated he was not an advocate of high tariffs, that he had not been educated to be an advocate of high tariffs, and like unto him I may say I am not a high-tariff advocate; but in this instance I feel that the rate in the proposed Connally amendment is wholly justified.

We are not living under conditions whereby the Government derives its revenue by virtue of a tariff for revenue only, but we are living under conditions whereby in most instances the manufactured products of the country are having the advantage of high tariff duties. This one raw commodity is about the only commodity produced in my State and in the mid-continent field which, in my judgment, could be benefited by a tariff duty. We have a tariff duty on one commodity produced in the West, namely, wheat, an agricultural product, but, in my judgment, the wheat growers are only indirectly and in a small way benefited by virtue of the tariff. The people residing in the mid-continent oil States would derive some benefit by virtue of a duty on oil and its by-products, and when we ask for a duty that would be only a revenue-producing duty, I feel, as a representative of the people whom I have the honor to represent here in part, I am wholly justified in casting a vote in favor of a duty of 1 cent per gallon on crude oil.

I assume in all probability the question will be raised before this discussion is closed, or rather the issue will be discussed that we are exporting from the United States more oil than is imported into the United States; that there is, in other words, apparently a trade balance in our favor—that our exports exceed our imports. I believe in recent years our exports have exceeded our imports, but let me explain, if I may in a brief way, that the imported oil comes from the South American countries to the Atlantic seaboard States, is sold, used, and consumed there in competition with domestic production. The oil exported is exported from the Pacific coast and is domestic-produced oil, refined in this country, and sold in Asiatic and oriental countries. The imported oil does affect the price of crude oil and the oil industry itself.

I happen to have had the privilege of observing for many years past the operations of the business of the independent oil producers. The independent oil producers of America, if you please, are the ones who have gone out and wildcatted and discovered the fields. They are the ones who have discovered the fields in Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and elsewhere. They are the ones who have purchased the leases from the farmers and developed the lands as oil-producing lands.

The question has been raised, in the committee at least, in what way will the farmer derive a benefit from this sort of a tax? Will it not raise the price of the refined products of oil he is forced to buy? I do not believe this duty will raise the price of the refined commodity to the consumer in this country. I do not believe it will affect materially the price of crude oil or any of its by-products to the consumer. On the other hand, I feel the farmer is directly benefited by virtue of the fact that we have the independent oil operators who have gone on his land, developed it, paid an acreage rental, paid him for the royalty oil, and things of that character. Every man in my State, and I think the same is true in other States, on whose land oil has been discovered receives under his lease a royalty of all of the oil produced from the land.

The farmers of my State have profited when the independent oil operator was permitted to prosper. Just a few years back virtually every acre of land in Kansas was leased for oil and gas purposes, and the landowner was receiving a yearly rental of $1 per acre. The farmer's taxes, if you please, were being paid by virtue of the rental he received whether there had been production developed on his land or otherwise. That condition does not prevail to-day, and the reason for it is simple. It is due to the fact that the independent oil operator of this country is being crushed out of business due to the importations of oil made by the large oil-importing companies.

However others may look at the proposition, I feel the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has developed here in the course of his argument the reason which prompts me, more than any other, to support the amendment. Ordinarily I feel high tariffs are calculated to encourage monopoly; that they are breeders of monopoly. In this instance, in my judgment, the proposed tax will work directly in the opposite direction.

The reason for this, I may say, is that the importing companies, the four named by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]—the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the Gulf Oil & Refining Co., and the Royal Dutch Shell, a foreign concern—have been the beneficiaries of unfair competition with the independent producers. They have had an unfair trade advantage in that they are able to produce in the South American countries, due to labor and other conditions, oil more cheaply and import it into this country free of any tax. The independent operators, heavily taxed, who have developed the mid-continent and other fields of the United States, by reason of these facts have not had the benefit of fair competition.

It was suggested that this import tax will increase the price of the commodity to the consumer. There can be no question, I may say to my good friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], that a tax on a commodity tends to increase the price of that commodity, whether it be an import tax or whether it be some other kind of a tax. It will under ordinary circumstances and conditions tend to increase the price of a commodity. But, Mr. President, if the commodity we have under consideration here comes within the control of a monopoly by virtue of the fact that the importing companies are not taxed and the independent operators, who are their only competitors in the business, are driven from the fields of their endeavor, then I say to my good friend the Senator from Maryland and to the other Members of the Senate the price of this commodity and the price of gasoline and all the by-products of crude oil, in my judgment, will materially advance.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McGILL. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. To whom do the independent operators sell their products?

Mr. McGILL. In most instances the products are taken by the pipe lines owned by the four companies I have named. I may say to the Senator, however, that they are not the only pipe-line companies which are taking oil from the mid-continent field, where I am mostly acquainted with conditions.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is it not a fact that the 20 large companies which are more or less in combination own 95 per cent of all the pipe lines in the country?

Mr. McGILL. I think that is approximately correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Therefore the independent oil producer must sell his output to those 20 large companies?

Mr. McGILL. There can be no question but that the large companies have already gained a material advantage, but I am not willing that we should give them a further advantage so as to completely and finally monopolize the industry in this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. The point I was making is that, inasmuch as the large companies against which the Senator is inveighing, but many of which do not import oil but rely upon American production for their supply, are so firmly intrenched with refineries, pipe lines, and distributing stations it seems to me they can pay the independent producer what they wish. Whether the oil is imported or not imported, the independent producer has to sell to the agencies which already own the transportation facilities, and, therefore, an embargo against imports would in no sense inure to the benefit of the independent oil owner. Is not that correct?

Mr. McGILL. If the Senator will permit me, I am not arguing for an embargo on any product that comes into this country; but, in my judgment, even though it be a fact that the large companies, in the main, own the pipe lines, notwithstanding that fact, if they are required to pay a tax on the oil they import into this country, they will be placed on a more equal competitive basis with the independent operator. That is one of the reasons, I may say, why I am in favor of the proposed tax.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Kansas, suppose that the tax would prevent all imports of oil; that no imports of oil came into the United States at all; that, for the sake of the example, the tax was, in effect, an embargo; what difference would it make to the independent oil-well owner? He would have to take the price offered him by the 20 large companies, because the independent operator has no pipe line; he has no transportation facilities; he has no refineries; he has no distributing stations. The only way he can market his product would be to acquire a tank wagon in Kansas, load it with oil, and sell his crude oil somewhere. So that, even if no oil were imported, would not the independent oil-well owner be at the mercy of the large company as to the price he would receive for his product?

Mr. McGILL. The Senator from Maryland is assuming a large number of facts in his questions many of which do not exist.

Mr. TYDINGS. What are those that do not exist?

Mr. McGILL. That the independent operators have no refineries, have no pipe lines, or anything of that character.

Mr. TYDINGS. What independent operators have such facilities for handling oil?

Mr. McGILL. There are a number of independent refineries in the different States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator be good enough to name a few such independent refineries?

Mr. McGILL. I know a man in my own city, by the name of Derby, who owns and conducts a refinery in that city.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. McGILL. I am yielding just now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. What independent companies own pipe lines to the Atlantic-seaboard market?

Mr. McGILL. I do not think there are any pipe lines to the Atlantic-seaboard market.

Mr. TYDINGS. What independent companies own distributing stations from Maine to Florida?

Mr. McGILL. It is possible that there are no independent operators who own gasoline stations and have distributing stations all the way across the continent; but I do not think, if the Senator will permit me to say so, that that is material to the argument I am making at this time. I am arguing against the advantage of the four large companies which oppose this tax; and may I say to the Senator that they are the only oil companies which have opposed a tariff on the importation of oil, and are the only companies that I know of in the world which are interested in the importation of oil into the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Now let us assume for the sake of the argument that these oil companies—a point which I do not concede—are opposing this tax; supposing—which I do not admit, and I think it is wrong—that the independent oil-well owner will get more for his oil, the Senator is certainly not so trustful as to believe that if the large companies, already wealthy, have to pay more for their product from the independent oil producers, they will not ask more for their products when they sell it to the consumer? I think the Senator will admit that.

Mr. McGILL. I have stated in the course of my remarks that a tax on a commodity, whether it be an import tax or any other tax, has a tendency to increase to the consumer the price of the commodity. That is true of every product the consumers of this country use.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is more than fair. I am glad that he is meeting the debate in an honest, frank, and candid way. Therefore the large oil company if it paid more for its oil and sold it for more than it is selling it for now would make just as much profit under that situation as it makes now, but the independent oil operator would get more for his oil. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. McGILL. The independent operator, in my judgment, under the proposed amendment of the Senator from Texas providing an excise import tax of 1 cent per gallon will not get very much in addition to the present prices for his oil, but he will be placed in a more equal competitive basis by virtue of the fact that the importing companies will be required to pay taxes the same as the independent operators are now required to pay taxes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McGILL. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. The point I made was this: I will assume for the sake of the argument that the independent oil man gets more for his oil, then the big company as it sells that man's product will charge more for its oil. The Senator said that is true. Therefore the big company will make just as much profit out of the oil without a tariff as it will with a tariff. Is not that correct?

Mr. McGILL. I fail to understand it in that way. Otherwise, they would not have witnesses before the committees of Congress opposing this import duty.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator himself admits that the price will go up to the extent that the big companies have to pay additional prices to the small producers.

Mr. McGILL. No; I do not admit that. I do not admit that the price of the commodity would increase in equal proportion to the amount of the duty.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator, then, assumes that such large companies as the Standard Oil Co. and the Sinclair Oil Co. and the Mid-Continent Oil Co. and all the other oil companies are going to pay the producer more for his oil and not raise the price to the American consumer?

Mr. McGILL. I have not said that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Well, what is the Senator's position?

Mr. McGILL. If the Senator will not interrupt me so much, he will probably be able to ascertain what my position is.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I just ask the Senator one more question, and then I will not interrupt him further? Let that last question go, because I think it answers itself, and no other answer is necessary; but, at any rate, no matter what the increased cost is to the large oil companies, no matter how much the tax will tend to raise the price, whatever that increase in price may be, it is going to be paid by the consumers of oil, so that every farmer all over this country and every user of fuel oil and every man who drives an automobile is going to pay, in addition to his present taxes, just the amount of the increase.

Mr. McGILL. Ordinarily the Senator would be correct, were it not for the fact that without some legislation which will tend to create an equality between the consumer and producers of this commodity and prevent an absolute monopoly, there is nothing to keep prices down. If there is to be permitted to grow up in this country a monopoly of this industry, no man can foretell what prices the farmer or the ultimate consumers of this Nation are going to have to pay for gasoline, crude oil, or any other products of oil. As the Senator from Louisiana has stated, in one or two of the South American countries they are paying the equivalent of 30 cents a gallon for gasoline, although in those very countries they are able to produce oil and gasoline cheap, so cheap their oil is exported to this country at a price $1.03 less than it costs to produce the same commodity in the United States, and deliver it to the Atlantic seaboard. Now, I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has said nearly everything I wanted an opportunity to say in answer to the Senator from Maryland. However, the statement the Senator from Maryland makes indicates that he has failed to acquaint himself with many of the facts.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will find out to-morrow that I am very well acquainted with all the facts.

Mr. LONG. The fact is, Mr. President, that in the year 1918, when Pine Island crude in Louisiana, and Gulf Coast crude in Texas, were selling for 60 cents a barrel, gasoline was selling for 26 cents a gallon. The fact is that a year later, when the monopoly had frozen us out and had taken our lands, the price of crude was $3.35, and the price of gasoline was 14 cents a gallon.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I do not desire to yield for a debate between the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. McGILL. I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a question. I wish to be entirely courteous.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will not the Senator yield just long enough for me to answer the question that was asked by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. I did not ask a question.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland intends to take the floor to-morrow morning and occupy the floor probably from 12 o'clock to 2 o'clock. He will have ample time then to answer the question. However, for the present I will yield for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Maryland to answer the inquiry made of him by the Senator from Louisiana, provided he does not take too long.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator and I will only take a moment. The very situation pictured by the Senator from Louisiana proves what I have been contending. Here was crude oil bringing a very small price and here was gasoline bringing a price with no relation to it, showing that the large companies could pay what they wanted for crude oil and sell it to the ultimate consumer regardless of its cost.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McGILL. In order to be courteous I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana, and then I will ask that I be not requested to yield again.

Mr. LONG. I merely want to say that the reason for that was that they brought the Mexican, Venezuelan, and Colombian crude in duty free and congested that area, whereas if we had a tariff they could not have done such a thing as that.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, since that portion of the argument has been properly disposed of, I will occupy only a few more moments.

We have pending before us several proposals with reference to unemployment conditions in this country. I do not wish to discuss that question at any length, but merely to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the president of the American Federation of Labor not long since estimated that the unemployment existing in the States in the mid-continent oil field by reason of the depressed condition in the oil industry, due to permitting importing companies to depress the market and crush the small concerns out of business, has caused the unemployment of about 300,000 more men in those States than otherwise would be unemployed.

There is another proposition, to my mind, which may be raised by some who will discuss this amendment, and that is our oil supply in the country.

I feel no one can foretell what we will be using as a substitute for oil a few hundred years from now in the event that we do not care or are not able to use oil at that time. Testimony was given before the committees of the Senate during the last session of the Congress and at this session to this effect: That while it is true that several years back the geologists of the United States estimated that there was only enough oil left to supply the demands of the market of the United States for a period of nine years, since that time there has been more oil produced and consumed by the American people than was estimated to exist at the time those geologists made their estimates.

During the last session of the Congress one of these same geologists was before a committee of the Senate, and in his testimony stated there are known oil reserves in the United States sufficient to guarantee that at the present rate of consumption we have enough oil in our own country to supply us for a period of over 500 years. That being true, there is no reason, to my mind, why we should not have the benefit of the American market for the American producer of this commodity.

Mr. President, for just a few moments in closing I desire to call attention to some of the facts relative to the proration and curtailment of the production of oil, as the attention of the Senate was directed to that proposition by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] in the course of his remarks.

In 1930 the domestic production of oil was reduced 109,000,000 barrels as compared with the year 1929. This was done by the independent operators of this country. It was reduced 109,000,000 barrels as compared with the year 1929. During the same period there were imported from these South American Republics by these four companies 105,000,000 barrels of oil. In other words, the importers nullified the curtailment made by the domestic producers. Virtually the same state of facts is true with reference to production and importation since that time.

I should like, however, to consider this measure from a revenue standpoint. It had been criticized as being a tariff measure in a revenue bill. It seems to me the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] fully answered any arguments which may be made against the amendment and against this provision of the bill arising from the contention that this is tariff legislation in a revenue bill. This is a revenue tariff, and I desire to consider it from the standpoint of being a revenue-producing measure. We are here attempting to balance our Budget, and I feel any legitimate tax that can be imposed on a commodity which will produce revenue should appeal to us as representatives of this Government.

Attention has been called to the figures given out by the Tariff Commission—an estimate made, I believe, to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. When those figures were handed around to the Senators while the Senator from Texas was discussing this measure, it seemed to surprise some among us that the Tariff Commission had made so large an estimate of revenue which would be produced by virtue of the tax on crude oil and the by-products of crude oil, as provided in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

I fail to understand on what theory any representative of the Government could arrive at the conclusion that a tax such as this proposal would produce a revenue of only approximately $5,000,000 per annum. I know of no facts on which to base an estimate of that sort. I do not know whether any other Senators, members of the committee or others, know on what facts this estimate was made; but certainly it can not be based on any known facts with reference to the importation of oil.

The figures as disclosed by the Tariff Commission to the Senator from Utah are in the hearings of the Finance Committee. The same identical calculations were furnished to that committee by the Independent Oil Producers' Association of America. In other words, the Tariff Commission finds now, and this producers' association reported to the Finance Committee, that the average importation of oil per year, if we take the years 1929, 1930, and 1931 and strike an average, was 2,636,367,888 gallons of crude oil. If that were taxed at the rate of 1 cent per gallon, it would produce a revenue to the Government of $26,363,678. There was fuel and gas oil imported into the United States in the amount of 1,002,734,334 gallons. If that were taxed at a cent a gallon, we can estimate what the revenue would be.

There was imported gasoline, naphtha, and other finished light products to the extent of over 551,000,000 gallons; lubricating oil, 1,339,548 gallons; paraffin and petroleum-wax products, 46,928,711 pounds; natural asphalt, petroleum asphalt, and bitumen, 73,770 long tons.

If a tax were imposed as provided in the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and the importation were approximately the same as it has been on an average for the past three years, it would yield in revenue to the Government annually something over $50,000,000.

I feel there can not be any good reason for contending that a tax such as is proposed by the Senator from Texas would materially decrease the importation into this country of oil and the by-products of crude oil. It does not stand to reason that a tax of 42 cents a barrel is going to keep a product out of this country when the differential is $1.03 per barrel. Likewise all of the other products, in my judgment, will come into the United States in about the same proportions that they have entered the United States during the last three years. The importations of oil have been increasing largely within the last few months, as shown by Government reports.

So I feel that this measure is a revenue producer; and I am among those who are looking for some tax such as this from which we can derive revenue and strike out of this bill before its final enactment some of the proposed taxes we have not thus far reached. I refer, if you please, to taxes such as the 2-cent tax on every bank check to be issued in this country.

Out in my State and in the States of the Middle West—and I am sure this is true the country over—the farmers sell their dairy products and various products and receive small checks—checks of from $2 to $3, $5, or $10. Very seldom do they receive checks above $10. On each one of such checks they are, under the provisions of this bill, to be burdened by a tax of 2 cents, if that part of the bill becomes a law. I say to my friends who are opposing this oil-import tax because they feel it may be a burden to the consumer that a tax such as this bank-check tax will be a much greater burden than anything that has been proposed in this bill in the way of a tariff duty.

Mr. President, I feel I have taken all the time I should. I did not intend to discuss the measure for more than 15 or 20 minutes when I rose; but I felt I should like to state my position and my reasons for supporting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. It is hardly fair to the Senator from Maryland to ask him to speak for a few moments this evening, so I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask whether it is understood that I shall have the floor in the morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland is recognized and yields for the purpose of taking a recess.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY WILBUR ON CHILD WELFARE

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold for a moment his motion for a recess?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] placed in the RECORD an article dealing with an address by the Secretary of the Interior on child welfare, delivered before the National Social Work Conference in Philadelphia. This morning's Philadelphia Record contains an article on the same subject. I ask that portions of it also may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record, May 18, 1932]

SPEAKERS HIT WILBUR CLAIM—REVEALS EVILS BABIES SUFFER—SECRETARY'S STATEMENT DEPRESSION AIDS CHILDREN DECLARED UNTRUE—REPORT SHOWS WOE IN FAMILIES—SOCIAL SERVICE NEAR BREAKDOWN FROM ADDED BURDEN WORKERS WARNED

By Mac Parker

Every corner of Philadelphia's Convention Hall echoed yesterday with condemnation of the Monday night speech of Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior.

Thousands of words were spoken to refute his assertions that the depression has been a good thing for the children of the Nation.

Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver, of Temple of Cleveland, addressing the 3,000 delegates to the National Social Work Conference, last night presented page after page of statistics and cases refuting the Wilbur claim.

TIMES ARE HARD

J. Prentice Murphy, of the Children's Bureau of Philadelphia, at a luncheon of the National Child Labor Committee, said in contradiction to Wilbur:

"Times are hard, and dangerously so for the children in all of our States. I am afraid the message which went out to the country from the national conference last night will not hearten our people."

Rabbi Silver said:

"Children especially are made to pay the cost out of their undernourished bodies and their hungry little hearts. They are underfed. They are sent hungry to school. They are poorly and scantily clad. They return to homes that are full of tension and strain. Children even more than adults do not live on bread alone. They thrive only in thriving homes. A home of peace and well-being will nurture their lives. A home depressed, shot through with bitterness and resentment, will blight their lives."

FAMILY HOME MORE

Doctor Wilbur said on Monday that children have never been fed more or better food than they have been getting through the depression. He said they no longer faced the perils of prosperity; that mothers and fathers in hard times stayed home more and gave their children more attention.

"Depressions are good for us, especially for the children," said Doctor Wilbur.

But Rabbi Silver replied last night:

"Families are being ground down into utter defenseless poverty. Should the present unemployment situation continue for another year we shall have completely pauperized at least a third of the working population of America. We shall have driven millions of our citizens into the class of dependents, while millions more will have their standard of living forced down to lower and still lower levels.

FORESEES JOBLESS INSURANCE

"We have until now misused the gifts of the mind-made machine, permitting the few to monopolize the wealth it has produced as well as the leisure and security. Put the machine in the hands of a truly social ideal and mankind will be launched on a career of social evolution such as no prophet has ever dreamed of.

"The State must compel industry to lay aside adequate reserves out of which benefits shall be paid to the worker whenever he is forced into involuntary unemployment. Those benefits shall be his as a matter of right and not of charity. Labor is not a commodity which may be purchased and disposed of at will. The worker is more than a partner in industry. Industry exists to provide a livelihood for the working masses of the world and to supply them with the necessities of life. Capital's share is secondary. First must come the adequate wage, security, protection against the disabilities of accident, sickness, old age, and unemployment, and then come the profits to investor and stockholder.

"The evils of prolonged unemployment are too apparent to require either catalogue or comment. The cost is paid to the last bitter farthing by men, women, and children in blasted hopes, thwarted ambitions, undermined health, lower morals, and embittered lives."

SOCIAL SERVICE WEAKENED

Social-service workers and their organizations, Rabbi Silver pointed out, have almost collapsed under the frightful burden of the depression.

"The overwhelming economic debacle of the past two and a half years," he said, "and the disastrous effects it has had on the whole structure of social service have left the social worker staggered and confused. In the face of an incredible economic collapse the social worker to-day stands helpless, his tools pathetically inadequate and all his garnered wisdom vain and futile.

"The cry for bread, the primitive hunger cry of the race, rising ominously from 20,000,000 throats to a terrifying crescendo, drowns out all other voices."

As against the picture painted by President Hoover's Cabinet officer, Rabbi Silver cited the findings of some of the agencies which come in close contact with the unfortunate.

DISABILITY IS PREDICTED

For instance:

The American Public Health Association reports that inadequate food, insufficient clothing, and overcrowded housing eventually will lead to an undermining of health and lowering of existence to such an extent that in years to come serious and permanent disabilities will result.

The American Hospital Association has been unable to keep up with the depression demands.

The National Organization for Public Health Nursing reports the abandonment of many necessary clinics.

The National Committee for Mental Hygiene finds increasing difficulties in maintaining accepted standards of care and treatment.

The National Recreational Association reports curtailment of activities which have been the greatest factor in decreasing juvenile delinquency.

GOES ON ENDLESSLY

The Child Welfare League of America report more children to care for than ever before and less money to provide the care.

The sad story goes on endlessly.

But the story of the material relief work which organized charity has been called upon to do is even sadder, in Rabbi Silver's opinion, for the social-service worker now has no adequate funds with which to distribute even the minimum of relief.

"The responsibility for the care of the unemployed," he said, "seems to be fixed nowhere, and governmental bodies vie with each other in passing this responsibility. The private agency turns to the municipality, the municipality to the county, the county to the State.

"In place of the $8.05 minimum weekly subsistence budget which the social agencies established in predepression days, many to-day are forced to distribute an average of $3.50 per week per family. This is not starvation. Neither is it relief. It is a hunger diet. And the social worker is compelled to spread his available relief funds thinner and thinner over a constantly increasing need.

IS INDUSTRY'S PROBLEM

"Unemployment is industry's problem and industry's burden, not charity's.

"Industry must not be permitted to lay its myriad casualties periodically at the door of philanthropy. This is a grotesque, not to say a criminal, procedure. The most highly developed industrial system in the world employs millions of men in the production of huge wealth which largely goes into the hands of the relatively few owners of industry, pays its men in normal times wages which fall short of the requirements of a decent standard of living, and as soon as the opportunities for profit making cease throws these men into the discard, advising them to go to the charitable agencies to which the workers themselves had previously been asked to contribute, to beg for famine rations for themselves and their families.

"Such is the cynicism and brutality of our economic order. It has even failed to give to its workers the security of servitude which feudalism once gave its serfs. So that a new terror has now come into the world. Every generation has its own overshadowing dread—pestilence, famine, invasion, the devil, or the end of the world, and the lives of that generation are darkened because of it. Into the twentieth century has come the dread terror of unemployment which hangs like a pall over the homes of the toiling masses."

CHURCH REPORT PRESENTED

Dr. Edward Devine, of New York, chairman of a committee of the Federal Council of Churches which has been engaged on a restatement of the social ideals of the church, presented a report on the committee's work at the annual dinner of the church conference of social work at the Benjamin Franklin.

"The text of this report," Doctor Devine said, "demands that the churches pledge their hearty support for a planned economic system in which maximum values shall be sought.

"The Christian ideal as we see it demands that cooperation shall supplant competition as the fundamental method. That is not a bolshevistic or a fascistic doctrine. It is wholly consistent for the most freedom for the individual and the utmost development of family life.

STRESS COOPERATIVE NEEDS

"We declare for industrial democracy. There are various ways of making progress toward it. Collective agreements between labor and capital, representation of workers in management, cooperative production in which capital is furnished by the workers themselves, and actual cooperation by the Government are all possible according to circumstances. It may turn out that certain larger common services, such as banking, power development, and distribution and transportation can best be managed collectively, leaving manufacturing, home building, agriculture, and the like to free individual initiative."

WORKER IS "DISAPPOINTED"

Secretary Wilbur's address brought criticism at the afternoon session of the social-service workers.

Clarence V. Williams, general secretary of the Illinois Home and Aid Society of Chicago, was franker in his criticism than most of the other delegates to the convention could permit themselves to be publicly.

"I was distinctly disappointed by Doctor Wilbur's speech, said Williams.

"Terrible things can come to thousands of children unless Congress takes some action. Children all over the Nation are in desperate circumstances. Some kind of relief must come. I think Doctor Wilbur was sounding a note of optimism to cheer us up. The note of the other speakers has been distinctly blue."

BENEFITS NOT SEEN

Karl de Schweinitz, secretary of the Committee on Unemployment Relief, declared:

"If anybody has benefited by the depression I, at least, have not noticed it."

Miss Jessie F. Binford, executive director of the Juvenile Protective Association of Chicago, declared, "Secretary Wilbur must not know what is happening all over the country.

"Homes are being broken up either by eviction or through the complete mental breakdown of parents who can not stand the strain.

"We know there is actual starvation existing in many sections, but apparently Mr. Wilbur is unaware of that."

PREDICTS "HEAVY PRICE"

Sherman C. Kingsley, executive secretary of the Philadelphia Welfare Federation, said:

"It is possible for everybody to make a blessing out of adversity if there isn't too much adversity, but it takes a large and hopeful philosophy to get much nourishment out of the predicament we are in now.

"The health and high morale of our people is the eighth wonder of the world. How long children can get anything out of foodless or near-foodless days remains to be seen, however.

"I think we shall pay a heavy price for years to come from the short rations and the worries and tragedies of the depression, which I think weigh especially heavily on the children."

LOANS TO FARMERS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter recently received by me from a man in my State who for many years has been engaged in making loans to farmers in behalf of the Prudential Insurance Co. of America.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 10, 1932.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: A friend has handed me to-day a copy of your speech in the Senate March 16, 1932; subject, The Farmer.

I can not refrain from writing you this line. You covered the subject in a most forcible, concrete way, giving the actual facts as they are. If the supposed brains of the United States will not listen to this and act quickly, there will be a national calamity. The American farmer must be protected and given a chance to live, thrive, pay his debts, and be a full, free consumer of the production of the rest of us.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE E. TOWLE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, let Thy light fall upon our waiting souls as we pray the words of our Redeemer. Judge us not in Thy displeasure, but look upon our infirmities and imperfections with pity, and help us to do better.

Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread; and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER PUBLIC LAND IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees, and when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was reached—

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I call up the bill (S. 2498) to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public lands in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLIVER of New York in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which I shall explain briefly, and it will be explained more in detail by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], who reported it.

It is a bill which passed the Senate on the 5th of February, 1932. It provides authority for the transfer of jurisdiction over public lands in the District of Columbia. The purpose of that transfer is twofold, at least. In the first place, without any undue delegation of authority from Congress, it will enable the Federal authorities and the authorities of the District of Columbia to make such transfers of land by mutual agreement between themselves for specific purposes, whereas otherwise new land would likely have to be purchased.

For instance, if it is contemplated by these authorities that a school building shall be erected and that a public park or playground shall be established, the District authorities desiring to build the school might have a suitable site for a playground, but no suitable site for the school building. The Federal authorities, on the contrary, desiring to build a playground might have a suitable site for a school, but not a suitable site for a playground.

By exchange of these lands, which would better facilitate the purposes of each, no additional land would have to be acquired by either the Government or the District, and the Government would be saved that expense.

Any conclusion which may be reached by the authorities must have the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. It has been customary for all of the items involved in a transfer of this kind to be referred to Congress and become the subject of legislation. Many of these things are almost perfunctory, many of them can be easily determined among these officers without taking up the time of Congress which could be devoted to more important legislation.

The acts to be performed, while they involve discretion, are largely ministerial, and the bill provides that a report of all such transfers shall be made to the Congress. It will make for the expedition of business.

In the consummation of these various projects it will save the time of Congress, which must now give a part of its time to legislation involved in transfers of this character, and in the judgment of the committee, this authority should be conferred.

As previously stated, the bill has passed the Senate and has been unanimously reported to the House by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I see that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], is present. He made the report on the bill, and has given the matter great study, and he will give a more detailed explanation of the purposes and provisions of this measure. I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in view of an objection, which was made to this bill when it appeared upon the Consent Calendar the other day, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is nothing providing for any transfer of title in this bill. It simply transfers jurisdiction, as anyone can see, by reading Senate bill 2498, which is now before the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Does it provide for, or require, extra guards or police, or employees?

Mr. DALLINGER. Absolutely not. The purpose of the bill, as has been explained by the chairman of our committee, is to give to the Federal and District authorities who have charge of public lands in the District of Columbia power to transfer jurisdiction over such property, either in whole or in part, among or between themselves, whenever it appears to be in the best interest of administration and maintenance. At present, whenever such transfers are necessary or advisable, action by Congress is required in each instance. At each session of Congress a considerable number of special bills to transfer jurisdiction over particular parcels of land in the District of Columbia are introduced in Congress, and we all know how difficult it is to get any bill relating to the District of Columbia through both Houses of Congress. It is a sad commentary upon our procedure here that it has been a long time since the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for instance, has had a Calendar Wednesday call, so that the only way that our committee, to which will be referred from time to time a number of these special bills, can get them before the Congress is on the Consent Calendar, and if one Member, through some fanciful notion, objects to the bill, it fails. If the bill is finally passed by the House and gets to the other body, if it is there objected to, it is passed over, and may not be enacted into law.

In view of the present comprehensive building program for the District of Columbia, the authorities expect the number of such special bills to greatly increase unless this bill is enacted.

To illustrate this point it may be said that at this time a number of exchanges have been proposed between the park office and the school board, as for instance, to provide better sites for a Northern High School and the Taft Junior High School in Brookland, and to avoid the purchase of additional land for a new building at the Keene School at Blair and Riggs Roads. For each of these exchanges separate special bills are now contemplated by the District commissioners, each of which will require separate action by congressional committees.

Furthermore, a number of exchanges of property are contemplated between two or more Federal and District agencies as that between the Soldiers' Home, War Department, and the District of Columbia for straightening the road south of the Soldiers' Home between Harvard Street and First Street NW. Another of the same nature is that for rounding out the property of the National Arboretum by transfer by the District of Columbia of areas of land to the Department of Agriculture in exchange for transfers from the arboretum for street purposes. A bill (S. 3547) has already been reported in the Senate for an exchange of properties between the park office, the District commissioners, and the War Department at Bolling Field.

The foregoing instances clearly show that the enactment of this bill is desirable as a means of obviating unnecessary legislation and thereby lessening the work of Congress.

Moreover, it can not be doubted but that the enactment of this bill would result in a substantial saving of public funds. In the first place it would make easier the most efficient use of land already owned by the Government and, secondly, it would avoid the purchase of additional lands when property now owned by the Government might be transferred to a desired use.

The bill can in no way be construed as an unwarranted delegation of the authority of Congress. The National Capital Park and Planning Commission, with representatives of a large number of Federal and District interests, including two Members of Congress, would in every case have to approve a transfer before it was consummated, and, besides this approval, the exchange would have to be agreeable to all the departments concerned.

In cases of land for streets and parks the District Commissioners and the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks already have the power to transfer jurisdiction without recourse to Congress. This bill provides that in the future the National Capital Park and Planning Commission shall recommend all such transfers, and it also provides that all transfers shall be reported to Congress.

The bill meets with the approval of the District Commissioners, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, and the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. The committee feels that the legislation is both desirable and necessary.

I will insert here as part of my remarks a letter from the executive and disbursing officer of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission requesting the introduction of this legislation and a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia urging its enactment; also a letter from the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital indorsing H. R. 425 and H. R. 5863, which are practically identical with S. 2498.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., December 21, 1931.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Shortly before the last Congress adjourned this office took up with you the question of introducing a bill to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public lands in the District of Columbia. Such a bill had already been introduced in the House by Congressman ROBERT LUCE. You expressed your entire willingness to introduce such a measure but felt that the time was too short to accomplish anything and therefore it was mutually agreed to postpone introduction of this bill in the Senate until the Seventy-second session of Congress.

Inclosed you will find the bill modified and redrafted so as to be mutually satisfactory to the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

This bill gives the administrative authorities in the National Capital permission to reach agreements among themselves for the best use of land without the necessity for specific authority of Congress in such cases. Quite a number of such special bills are now acted upon at each session of Congress and it is expected that the number will increase as the public land is more and more crowded and the uses for it multiply.

This office feels very strongly the need for such legislation. In the specific case of land for streets and parks, the District Commissioners and the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks already have such authority of law; that is, upon certification of the commissioners of the District that a certain edge of a park or triangle is needed for street purposes, the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks may, under authority of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 570), transfer jurisdiction over the required strip to the commissioners; similarly the commissioners may transfer to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks any land acquired for street purposes not immediately needed, with the assurance that the same land may be recovered by them for street purposes. The law has worked so satisfactorily and simplified procedure in so many cases in the public interest, without a case of abuse or unwise action having been taken under this authority, that I feel the method can be advantageously extended.

There are many cases in which such authority, if lodged in the administrative officers by Congress, would result in an economical saving to the Government.

Respectfully yours,

U. S. GRANT 3D,
Executive and Disbursing Officer.

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 19, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia recommend the enactment of Senate bill 2498, Seventy-second Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public land in the District of Columbia," which you referred to them for consideration and report.

The commissioners believe the proposed legislation is meritorious.

Very sincerely yours,
BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
L. H. REICHELDERFER, President.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1932.

Hon. FRITZ G. LANHAM,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LANHAM: In reply to your inquiry of January 13, I wish to express my personal indorsement of H. R. 425 and H. R. 5863, and to advise you that this legislation is also strongly recommended by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. Either measure will effect considerable economy for the District of Columbia, and relieve the committees of Congress of the burden of handling a very considerable number of individual special bills.

The two bills are alternatives, only one of which should be passed. H. R. 425 is the form in which the bill was originally written by Mr. LUCE, and the form in which it was recommended by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission at the last session of Congress.

H. R. 5863 is a new draft, revised to comply with what is understood to be the wishes of the District Commissioners. It is perfectly satisfactory to the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and myself.

(In case you can arrange a hearing of either of these bills before your committee, I would appreciate an opportunity to present a full statement of the need for it and the advantages to be derived from it.)

Respectfully yours,

U. S. GRANT 3D, Director.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by giving a list of possible transfers of jurisdiction that are now pending and for which special bills have been introduced. There are eight of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

POSSIBLE TRANSFERS OF JURISDICTION UNDER H. R. 5863—S. 2498

First. Site for new Keene School: Transfer between District school authorities and Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. Will save purchase of new site and provide improved location for proposed Fort Drive Parkway.

Second. Northern High School: Transfer between District school authorities and Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. Will provide improved hilltop location for high school. More centrally located in area to be served as well as more economical development of play area for proposed recreation center.

Third. Bolling Field extension and Shepherd Parkway (S. 3547): Exchange between War Department, Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks, and District Commissioners. To rectify boundaries and provide for relocation of highways.

Fourth. Relocation of Michigan Avenue, south of Soldiers' Home: Involving the transfer of jurisdiction between United States Engineer Office, War Department, Soldiers' Home, and the District of Columbia. For straightening of highway and consolidation of properties.

Fifth. Arboretum boundaries: Transfer between school authorities, Department of Agriculture, and District Commissioners for highway purposes. To round out the property lines of the Arboretum in exchange for transfer to the District for highway purposes of equal area of ground.

Sixth. Taft Junior High School: Transfer between District school authorities and Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. Will provide for adjustment of property line between school and recreation area for improved location of the school building.

Seventh. St. Elizabeths—Fort Drive: Transfer between Department of Interior and National Capital Park and Planning Commission, providing for utilization of strip at back edge of St. Elizabeths for the Fort Drive, saving purchase of similar area elsewhere for this parkway.

Eighth. National Training School—Fort Drive: Similar exchange to provide parkway connection between Fort Lincoln and the Anacostia Park, saving the cost of acquisition of an alternative route.

Separate bills are contemplated for each of these exchanges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly indicate specific instances in the District where this bill if put into effect would apply?

Mr. DALLINGER. I have just inserted in my remarks a list of such instances. First is the site for the new Keene School. This is a transfer between the District school authorities and the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. It will save the expense of the purchase of a new site and will provide an improved location for the proposed Fort Drive Parkway. This would do two things, obviate the necessity for buying land for school purposes and at the same time by exchange make it unnecessary to take land for a park. Then there is the case of the Northern High School. This is a transfer between the District school authorities and the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks, the object being to provide an improved hilltop location for the proposed high school, more centrally located in the area to be served, as well as a more economical development of an area for a proposed recreation center. All of these things could be done without any expense whatever, because either the District of Columbia or the Federal Government owns the property.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. There has been criticism by some of the proposal to authorize the President to reorganize the executive departments of the Government on the ground that it was an improper delegation of legislative authority, as the gentleman from Massachusetts well knows. Does the gentleman see any similarity between that proposal and this bill which in effect would authorize the National Capital Park and Planning Commission to transfer jurisdiction of land in the District of Columbia from the District authorities to the Federal authorities, and vice versa?

Mr. DALLINGER. The only similarity I see is that it will result in the saving of expense. In this case the saving of expense is apparent upon its face.

Mr. MAPES. Perfectly apparent, but if this can be done can not the President be authorized to reorganize the executive departments?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that this is the third Congress in which I have introduced a bill giving the President absolute power to eliminate, consolidate, and reorganize the executive departments of the Government, something that he has asked for repeatedly; and I may add that a Democratic Member, Mr. Davey, of Ohio, well known as a tree man, introduced a similar bill when Mr. Coolidge, a Republican President, was in the White House.

I have always felt that Congress might well have given this power to the President and have saved all this wrangling about the economy bill that we have had. The President was willing to take the responsibility and make the saving, but Congress was so afraid to delegate even for a limited time some of its power that it refused to comply with the President's request; and, while my bill in form was incorporated in the economy bill, it was so emasculated that it will accomplish very little in the present emergency.

Mr. MAPES. I had no doubt of the gentleman's position, but I wanted to call attention to the question in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MAY. This is a very short bill, and I do not want to take unnecessarily the gentleman's time but to avoid the offering of an amendment; I notice that the bill authorizes the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and directs that they make reports of all these transfers to the Congress. Does not the gentleman think that, in line 2, on page 2, following the word "shall," it would be a good idea to insert the words "before being finally consummated," so that before they consummate any of these transfers they shall be reported to the Congress so that they could be investigated to see whether the transfer should be made or not?

Mr. DALLINGER. I do not think it is necessary. None of these transfers can be made by the authorities immediately in question without the consent and approval of this National Capital Park and Planning Commission. Perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky is not familiar with the make-up of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. I would like, right at this point, for the information of the gentleman and for the information of the members of the committee, to read a list of the members of that commission. It is as follows:

Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, United States Army; Maj. John C. Gotwals, engineer commissioner, District of Columbia; Horace M. Albright, Director National Park Service; R. Y. Stuart, Chief, Forest Service; Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER, chairman Senate Committee on the District of Columbia; Hon. MARY T. NORTON, chairman House Committee on the District of Columbia; Frederick Law Olmsted, Brookline, Mass., one of the leading landscape architects of the country; J. C. Nichols, Kansas City, Mo.; William A. Delano, New York City; Lieut. Col. U. S. Grant, 3d, United States Army, Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, a man whom I think every Member of Congress has absolute confidence in.

I do not know of anyone connected with the executive branch of the Government who makes a finer appearance before our committees than Colonel Grant. Nothing can be done without the approval of this commission. It is a thoroughly representative body, on which the Senate and the House of Representatives have representation.

Mr. MAY. I would like to say that, with the explanation of the personnel of this commission, the amendment I suggest would not be necessary, but I had not studied the provisions of previous acts on the question, and I did not know whether there were any restrictions surrounding it or not and made the suggestion merely for that reason.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I am rather surprised to hear the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts recommend the passage of and father such a bill as this. The gentleman knows that under just such relinquishment of power and authority we were compelled recently to take emergency steps to keep them from tearing down the Municipal Building, a splendid building, in splendid repair; to keep them from tearing down the Southern Railway Co. building, for which we paid an enormous sum and which is a splendid modern building, in fine repair; to keep them from tearing down the State, War, and Navy Building, one of the most picturesque buildings in Washington; and to keep them from tearing down the Post Office Department Building, than which there is no finer looking building in the city. If we are going to continue to relinquish the power and authority and control of Congress on such matters, I do not know where it will end. The gentleman has always been one of those who stood here and defended the right of Congress to pass upon these various matters, and I am surprised that the gentleman is changing.

Mr. DALLINGER. I will state that the gentleman is entirely wrong. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have taken the ground that it is ridiculous for Congress to try to deal with so many details. If the gentleman from Texas will study the English Government, he will find that Parliament does not try to deal with such trivial questions as the naming of streets or the transfer between two authorities of a little piece of land that would be for the benefit of both.

The English Parliament deals with great questions of policy. The trouble with our Congress is that we try to deal with every little petty detail. It is absolutely ridiculous for this great body of men, paid by the taxpayers of this country $10,000 a year, to act as a city council for the District of Columbia, and deal with such trifling things. [Applause.] We ought to deal with matters of importance to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. We have done pretty well dealing with them for the past hundred years, have we not?

Mr. DALLINGER. No; I do not agree with the gentleman. In my opinion the fact that we have not passed a bill like this has cost the taxpayers millions of dollars in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. But we protected the rights of the American people.

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman from Texas talks about tearing down these buildings. That has nothing whatever to do with this bill. There is absolutely nothing in this bill about tearing down buildings or constructing buildings, and there is no appropriation authorized or required. This bill simply provides for a mutual transfer of jurisdiction, so that for instance, the school department of the District of Columbia can have jurisdiction over a little piece of land adjoining a schoolhouse and use it for a playground, instead of requiring the Park Commission to still have jurisdiction over it, and the school department be unable to use it for a playground. That is what we are dealing with here.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will yield further.

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. We have right now in Washington some little two-by-four bureau that is continually telling Congress how far it can go and where it must stop, and what the limitations on Congress itself are, because of the relinquishment of power we have made from time to time to such bureaus. I am getting tired of seeing bureaus control Congress. I want to see Congress control every bureau and every department of Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Now, in response to the question originally asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin before we switched off on a little sidetrack, I wish to go on with the particular proposed transfers that are now pending. There is the Bolling Field extension and Shepherd Parkway. There it is desired to exchange some land between the War Department, the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks, and the District Commissioners, in order to rectify boundaries and provide for the relocation of highways.

Then there is the proposed relocation of Michigan Avenue out in front of Soldiers' Home and near the Catholic University, involving a transfer of jurisdiction between the War Department, the Soldiers' Home, and the District of Columbia, for the purpose of straightening the highway in the interest of public safety. Now, it is that sort of little thing that requires a special act of Congress and perhaps takes years to get it through.

The next is the arboretum. As you know, Congress has authorized the acquiring of a lot of land for a great arboretum out in the northeast. There is desired a transfer of jurisdiction between the school authorities of the District of Columbia, the Department of Agriculture, and the District Commissioners, in order to round out the property lines of the arboretum, in exchange for a transfer to the District for school and highway purposes.

In other words, the Federal Government owns a big tract of land out there and the District of Columbia government has a school and a highway in the same locality. They simply want to exchange jurisdiction over a little land so as to make a better playground, a better highway, and round out the boundaries of the arboretum.

Next is the case of the Taft Junior High School, a transfer of jurisdiction between the District school authorities and the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks. This will provide for the adjustment of the property line between the school and recreation area and for an improved location of the school building. Understand, gentlemen, all this property is owned either by the Federal Government or by the District of Columbia.

Then there is the St. Elizabeths Hospital-Fort Drive transfer between the Department of the Interior, which has control of St. Elizabeths Hospital, and the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. It simply provides for the utilization of a strip of land at the back edge of St. Elizabeths Hospital grounds for the Fort Drive, saving the purchase of similar area elsewhere for this parkway.

Finally, there is the National Training School-Fort Drive transfer—a similar exchange—to provide parkway connection between Fort Lincoln and the Anacostia Park, saving the cost of acquisition of an alternative route. In other words, they are making a beautiful drive to connect the old historic forts of the Civil War. They come to a point where there is a little piece of vacant land owned by some other department of the Government, and they come up against a dead end. Now, why make the National Capital Park and Planning Commission go to the expense of acquiring more land at the expense of the taxpayers when the Federal Government can give a small slice off St. Elizabeths Hospital and thus make it unnecessary to go to any further expense?

Mr. Chairman, I have now taken up in detail eight proposed bills involving the question of transfer of jurisdiction. The chances are that none of these bills, in the jam we are in, will be enacted before Congress adjourns, which will result in all of these public improvements being held up, and probably sooner or later appropriations will have to be made for the purchase of property, which would be unnecessary if this bill is passed.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will be speedily enacted into law. It is absolutely safeguarded, and there is no possible way in which the public can suffer or the taxpayers suffer; but, on the contrary, it will result from year to year in a constantly increasing saving to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HAINES. Do I understand that if it is desired to change the name of a street in the District of Columbia it is necessary to pass an act of Congress to do it?

Mr. DALLINGER. It is necessary.

Mr. HAINES. I have a letter from a very fine lady in my district who would like to have a street or avenue in the District named after Thomas Edison, and it would require an act of Congress to do so?

Mr. DALLINGER. It certainly would. We passed a bill at the last session changing the name of B Street to Constitution Avenue. It was one of the last measures in which our dear friend, Mr. Cooper, of Wisconsin, was interested, and it required an act of Congress to make the change. It requires acts of Congress to take care of all of these petty matters, and I say it is simply ridiculous. By and by the people of the country will awaken to the fact that their Congress is spending its time in caring for petty matters when it should be dealing with great matters of public policy.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield on that insignificant point?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Massachusetts Avenue is one of the most beautiful streets in the Nation's Capital. Everyone knows its boundaries. Does the gentleman want to give authority—and he intimates it has been done—to some little two-bit commission to change the name of Massachusetts Avenue to some little insignificant name?

Mr. DALLINGER. It all depends on the form of the statute.

Mr. BLANTON. I want these people to come to Congress whenever they want to change the name of Massachusetts Avenue. It may be unimportant to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but it is important to the rest of the country.

Mr. DALLINGER. I am perfectly willing to leave all of those petty details to a properly constituted body, feeling sure such a body would have sense and brains enough to know what to do in regard to the changing of the names of streets and avenues. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat apprehensive about conferring uncontrolled authority as to the exchange of property upon a commission without review by the Congress. I think we should hesitate before conferring this vast authority, particularly as to any land over which the Congress has immediate control.

This bill has the indorsement of the eminent executive officer of the public buildings and public parks commissioner, Gen. U. S. Grant, 3d. It has been stated that he is desirous of having the Botanic Gardens—on which is erected the statue in memory of his grandfather—transferred to the jurisdiction of the commission over which he so efficiently presides. I cite that one instance to show the danger of lodging such authority in the hands of a commission without any control whatsoever by the Congress. I do not think such authority should be vested in any commission without the approval of Congress.

During the last Congress this same eminent executive officer asked for authority to vest in the Commissioners of the District the right to close all the alleys and streets in the District, a very absolute authority which I did not think should be lodged in any commission. I did not think an administrative board should be clothed with authority to close alleys in the heart of the city of Washington which might be of great moment to adjacent property owners, and allow a board to determine whether those alleys should be closed or not, when their value might run into hundreds of thousands of dollars, nor do I believe we should vest similar authority in a board to exchange property and transfer the control and use in different agencies. I am opposed to that, and the gentleman who is sponsoring this bill can not cite any case in a commission form of government where that great authority is lodged in any commissioners.

Because it is sometimes rather burdensome for the Congress to pass on these small matters, the argument is made we should surrender and delegate this control as to its use and jurisdiction.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], the author of this bill, has cited some pending instances as warrant for the passage of the bill, and calls attention to the relocation of Michigan Avenue south of Soldiers' Home as one of the eight instances. The Congress, without much ado, upon a favorable report from the District of Columbia Committee, passed that measure through the House within a few minutes. It required very little consideration; but the question of the propriety of our taking land for a street went through the regular channels of the Congress, the District of Columbia Committee.

There are some other instances where they intend to authorize the transfer of property owned by the War Department upon the determination of these executive officers. The determination is legislative and not administrative, and in the Committee on Military Affairs we have been trying to safeguard the property owned by the Army, keeping it for Army purposes and not allowing it to be disposed of for other purposes.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, who has had so many years of experience on the District of Columbia Committee. I always value the opinions expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] are discussing, in my opinion, a very interesting subject, one to which I have given years of thought; in fact, I have tried to draw a bill to relieve Congress of some of these minor duties; but it is an incident of ownership. You can not divest yourself of these small matters of control if the Congress is to control its own home city. I would simply remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that before Congress adopted this course the Congress of the United States was chased through the streets of Philadelphia by a mob.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is something more, as the gentleman has presaged in his remarks, than merely getting rid of some of the tedious work applying to little matters affecting the District, and we should hesitate before we surrender absolute control over all Federal property in the District which may be exchanged as these executive boards may determine, without any further approval by the Congress. My position is confirmed by the experience and judgment of the gentleman from Kentucky who has studied this question for years as a member of the District of Columbia Committee.

I have cited one concrete case of the Botanic Garden. I do not know whether that property should be turned over to the Public Buildings and Grounds Commission or not. When I see the shabby and neglected condition of that so-called Botanic Garden, as I do every day in walking through it, I am in a quandary as to the proper authority for its care. A large tree there was blown down in the high wind storm of six weeks ago that is leaning against a live tree and causing it to be distorted in its upright position. Again there was an old salamander right in the plain view of Pennsylvania Avenue for months and months. There is no care or attention given to that Botanic Garden whatsoever. I sometimes feel inclined to take an ax and cut down the tree so it will not dislodge the other tree. The keeper, or whoever has charge, is so neglectful, but that is no reason we should surrender jurisdiction and control of the Botanic Garden, although it may be ill managed by the present supervisor.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin think that the suggestion which I made to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we reserve some control over it by amending this bill so as to provide that this commission's report shall not become final until Congress has considered it, is a proper one?

Mr. STAFFORD. I was interested in the proposed amendment; but that amendment would merely stay all proceedings. It would only amount to the same practice that is now indulged in, and instead of having them referred to the District of Columbia Committee they would be referred to the Congress and the matter would be kept dangling in the air. The gentleman should make his amendment more pervasive, so that Congress would really control the disposition of all Federal property. The language of the bill is:

> That Federal and District authorities administering properties within the District of Columbia owned by the United States or by the said District are hereby authorized to transfer jurisdiction over parts or all of such properties among or between themselves for purposes of administration and maintenance, under such conditions as may be mutually agreed upon.

Never have we vested such authority in any administrative board, never have we surrendered full control of property which the National Government owns to administrative officials as this bill provides, and the only argument advanced by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who hails from the classic shades of Cambridge, is that it will relieve us of some tedium with minor legislation. That is no justification for surrendering a principle of law.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will guarantee that if every Member here will invite a dozen of his constituents to Washington, and will take them down here, show them the Municipal Building, the Southern Railway Building, owned by the Government, the State, War, and Navy Building, and the Post Office Building, everyone of them will vote unanimously that it would be ridiculous to think of tearing those buildings down, and yet, because we gave power to some little commission, it sought to demolish all of these buildings, and this Congress not three months ago had to rush in an emergency provision in an appropriation bill to stop them from demolishing those buildings. Is not that ridiculous? The gentleman from Massachusetts does not want us to handle such little matters.

A few years ago there was a splendid woman who had been magnanimous to the District of Columbia, who had been generous with her money, who proposed to change the name of Sixteenth Street to the Avenue of the Presidents. She might have had influence with some little commission and caused it to have been done, if you granted the power to such commission; but she could not get it through committees in Congress. There was no necessity for it. Everyone knows where Sixteenth Street is, it has Fifteenth Street on one side and Seventeenth Street on the other, and to change it would have been disorganizing the entire map of the city. There was no necessity for it at all, but because her castle was on the hilltop she thought it would be nice to have it changed to the Avenue of the Presidents.

These are little things, but control over them has been vested in Congress, and I am not in favor of our relinquishing our authority over such matters.

I know that the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself nor no one else can stop the passage of a bill that comes on the floor with the unanimous consent of the committee. All I can do is to register my protest against such legislation.

When Congress gets through its work you always will find bills of this character brought in, because something has to be taken up. You will find these bills brought in that ought not to be passed.

Why, do you know, gentlemen, the House of Representatives is practically through with its work. There is no sane reason on God's earth why Congress should not adjourn early in June. [Applause.]

The people of the country want us to adjourn, for it would be in the interest of the American people for Congress to adjourn.

I have heard it stated that some politicians who are not Members of the House, who must this year campaign an entire State, would prefer to do their campaigning from Washington rather than to make speeches in hot summer weather, and do not want to meet the people at home and have them ask questions that can not be answered, and that they are the ones who are not going to allow Congress to adjourn June 10.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, is not this Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wonder why the gentleman from Connecticut always wants to hamstring me.

Mr. GOSS. I wanted the gentleman to give us some information.

Mr. BLANTON. I am giving the gentleman information; I am giving the information that this kind of a bill ought not to pass, and it would not be passed except when Congress has nothing else to do. I am speaking about the wise necessity for an early adjournment of Congress, and the statement that politicians have to campaign their whole States during the summer, where their constituents might ask them a lot of questions they do not want to answer, prefer to stay in the city of Washington, to keep Congress in session the entire summer.

I want to tell you what I am not afraid to say: If any politician from my State votes to hold this Congress in session this summer for a fool reason like that, he will never get my vote when he runs for reelection, and I shall let the people of the country know in the various States the reason that the Congress was kept in session.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I rise to congratulate the gentleman on what he is saying. What he is saying now is more important to the whole country than 16 bills like the one under discussion.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. As I say, we will pass this Army bill, and I hope the Patman bill, and the deficiency appropriation bill, and then the labor of our friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and our friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] will have been completed, and what they ought to do is to serve notice on the country that we are going to be ready to adjourn and demand that this Congress adjourn early in June, and we will back them up 100 per cent in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman and I sometimes agree, do we not?

Mr. BLANTON. Very frequently. The gentleman from New York has rare good judgment on occasions. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Texas is in entire harmony with the statement I gave out to the newspapers yesterday, that as far as I am concerned, and as I know the sentiment of this House, we feel that it is very important that we complete the business of the Congress and adjourn before we go away from here.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman on that statement 100 per cent.

Mr. SNELL. And I hope the other Members of the House are.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me in order that I may ask a question of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the position of the distinguished minority leader to be that the Congress should remain in session during the convention period if the Congress has not completed its work prior to June 10?

Mr. SNELL. As far as I am personally concerned, I think the first duty of Congress is to get the appropriation bills, the tax bill, and the economy bill out of the way. Further, as far as I am concerned personally, and as far as I know the membership of the House, the Members want to attend to these three things, first of all, and not let anything interfere with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not even the conventions?

Mr. SNELL. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. And have the Congress stay on its job until we pass the essential legislation, and throw the burden where it belongs—on the other body—if they do not do their work.

Mr. SNELL. And further, the Speaker and I gave out a joint statement to that effect to the newspapers this morning. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am very glad to hear that. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and our distinguished Speaker will serve notice on the country that there is not going to be any recess, but that we are going to finish our business and adjourn, and that it will be a sine die adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. We did not serve any notice on anybody, but we took the position that that is the attitude of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. And our friend from New York has seen times when it looked as though it would take a month to pass an appropriation bill somewhere else, and all of a sudden a realization would come that it is necessary to pass bills quickly, and we have seen four appropriation bills passed in one night somewhere else. That is what ought to be done now. The business of the people ought to be attended to, and we ought to go home.

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KARCH. Is the gentleman in favor of adjourning without this House entertaining or passing some kind of unemployment relief?

Mr. BLANTON. Let me give the gentleman my view. All on earth that this Government owes an American citizen, a high-principled American citizen, one with self-respect and self-reliance, is an equal opportunity to find work. The Government does not owe a living without work to any person on God's earth; and, if I am here one month or a hundred years, I will never be in favor of giving a dole to an American citizen. [Applause.] Whenever you give a man money from the Government you make him lose his initiative and his self-respect, you make him lose his self-reliance, you make him lose his patriotism. I am in favor of passing the Patman bill before we adjourn.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it true that if this Congress is going to pass any unemployment legislation and other constructive remedial legislation it can do it between now and the 10th of June?

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, it can do it easily.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As long as it does it.

Mr. BLANTON. I saw the biggest bill passed in this Congress in years, a $2,000,000,000 bill, in a little while on this floor. I voted against it. When you get ready to pass measures you can pass them, both here and somewhere else. It does not take days and weeks and months. Let us get busy and get through and go home and let the country have a rest. That is what the people want. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct my remarks to the bill under consideration.

In my work on the Committee on Appropriations and on the subcommittee handling District affairs, the condition which exists here has been frequently brought to our attention. Under present conditions, before an exchange between two departments which might affect only the corner of a lot of little value, or before any arrangements for a permanent improvement can be definitely made, they must come to Congress and secure the passage of a special bill. Congress usually relies on the recommendation of the committee, and the committee relies on the recommendation of those departments that are especially interested. But we all know that the calendars become clogged, and frequently months and sometimes years elapse before the legislation can be secured.

This bill does not give additional power to the Capital Park and Planning Commission. It provides that two different departments may arrange for a transfer or a trade, but even when those two departments have agreed, that exchange must be O. K'd by the National Park and Planning Commission. The National Park and Planning Commission has not any authority in the first instance to bring about any exchange.

Some of the examples mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] I am personally acquainted with, and I know it will be of benefit to the schools and to the Park and Planning Commission if exchanges can be made.

My observation has been that all departments of the Government are very jealous about alienating their control over any property that may be within their jurisdiction, and I think this will safeguard the public. One department will not be trading with another department unless they feel they are receiving full value in exchange for what they are giving up.

Therefore, in order not only to save the time of Congress but to expedite the business of the Government and the District of Columbia, I believe this authority should be given, and I believe it will not only result in savings from time to time but it will result in the expedition of the public business.

In my personal experience I can recall instances where proposed improvements, the building of schoolhouses and other improvements, have been held up several months because it was necessary to come to Congress. The permission of Congress was usually received, but sometimes it takes weeks and months. Therefore I believe, in the interest of efficiency in our Government, it is wise for Congress to pass this bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. This bill, of course, provides only for the administration and maintenance of these properties, and it provides that there must be mutual agreement between the United States authorities and the District authorities before any transfer is even considered. Then, after that mutual agreement, it must be recommended by the National Park and Planning Commission, which is composed of various Federal officials, including two Members of Congress, one Member from the Senate and one from the House of Representatives. I think reports are made to Congress. Is that not a sufficient safeguard?

Mr. HOLADAY. I think it is sufficiently safeguarded to protect the public interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, on day before yesterday I furnished the House with figures showing the expenses of Federal judges sitting in districts other than their own. I note two items in the press, one a dispatch from Denver containing a statement by Judge J. Foster Symes, of Denver, who stated that my statement was absolutely false. I want to state to the judge that when he made that satement he was deliberately, maliciously, and willfully making a misstatement of the facts that he then knew was not true, because my figures were taken from his own vouchers in the office of the Comptroller General, which is the accounting office of the United States Government.

I want to inform the House that while those judges move up to New York to sit, and charge their extra allowance, other judges move into their districts. For instance, in southern Alabama, Judge Borah, of eastern Louisiana, and Judge Kennamer, of middle Alabama, held court during the absence of Judge Ervin in New York.

In eastern Arkansas, Judge Youmans, of western Arkansas, was assigned during the absence of Judge Martineau.

In northern California, during the absence of Judge St. Sure, court was held in this district by Judge Miller, of North Dakota.

In southern California, during the absence of Judge McCormick, the following judges from other districts were assigned to this district: Judge Jacobs, of Arizona; Pollock, of Kansas; Norcross, of Nevada; Hazel, of western New York; Korrigan, of northern California; and Killits, of northern Ohio.

In Colorado, during the absence of Judge Symes, court was held in Denver by Judge Kennedy, of Wyoming.

In western New York, during the absence of Judge Alder, court was held by Judge Hazel, of the western district, and Judge Knox, of the southern district. In other words, one judge went north and another went south in New York.

In eastern New York, during the absence of Judge Galston in the southern district of New York—in the same city—Judge Sheppard, of northern Florida, was assigned to eastern New York. A judge in Brooklyn goes over to Manhattan and he charges for his five days, and they bring a judge from Florida all the way to Brooklyn to take his place.

In southern Texas Judge Estes, of the eastern district, was assigned to the southern district during a portion of the time that Judge Hitcheson was in New York.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. Is not the transfer of judges made necessary because of the disqualification of judges in their respective districts, and are they not assigned by the circuit court in different districts?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; not because of disqualification. Yes; they are assigned by the senior circuit judge.

Mr. GARBER. And they hold those courts in different districts, according to the assignment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, they are district judges, and they go from one district to another. I have exposed a circuit judge assigning himself in his own district and drawing several thousand dollars extra.

But, let me say to the gentleman, I inquired just how this was done. The senior circuit judge, when he needs judges, asks other circuit judges, and then he assigns, and it is approved by the Chief Justice. But then, I asked, how does a judge from another district, assigned to hold court in the southern district, leave his temporary assignment? And this is the reply submitted by the Department of Justice to the Judiciary Committee of the House. Listen to this:

I do not know exactly how to answer this, but I presume he may leave at any time he desires, upon notice to the senior circuit judge.

Mr. GARBER. Who made the statement to which the gentleman is referring?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This statement is submitted by the Department of Justice and is made by the General Agent and Chief Clerk of the Supreme Court in answer to my resolution directed to the Department of Justice.

I shall read the complete reply into the RECORD. It is astonishing.

Item 3 is "Who selected the judges so assigned" to the southern district of New York. I have no information as to who selected them, but the procedure is as follows: The senior circuit judge of the second circuit (in which New York is located) certifies as to the need for the assignment of a district judge from another circuit, and the senior circuit judge of the other circuit consents to the designation and assignment of a district judge (naming him in the certificate) to hold court in the southern district of New York for a certain period and for such further time as may be required to complete unfinished business. These certificates are forwarded to the Chief Justice of the United States, who formally designates and assigns the district judge named in the last-mentioned certificate. The papers are then sent to the Department of Justice for filing.

If, however, the judge assigned to the southern district of New York is from any other district in the second circuit the assignment is made by the senior circuit judge of that circuit and the consent of the senior judge of another circuit, and approval of the Chief Justice of the United States is, of course, unnecessary.

Item 4 of the resolution asks "how a judge from another district assigned to hold court in the southern district may leave his temporary assignment." I don't know exactly how to answer this, but I presume he may leave at any time he desires upon notice to the senior circuit judge. He could hardly be compelled to stay in New York if he wishes to leave.

Item 5 asks "to whom are the vouchers for expenses of judges sitting in districts other than their own submitted for approval." No "approval" is required. Such vouchers are paid on the certificate of the judge who incurred the expense by the United States marshal of the district to which the judge is assigned, in this instance the southern district of New York.

Another judge who had the audacity to endeavor to reply to the disclosure of his own voucher was Judge Kennedy, of Teapot Dome fame. Let Judge Kennedy say something about that disgraceful decision of his.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words with reference to what was stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], concurred in so heartily by my colleague from New York [Mr. SNELL].

I do not concur in all this talk that Congress is to blame for present business conditions. Congress was not in session from the 3d of March, 1931, until December, 1931, and conditions were never worse in the history of this country. During that time business, industry, and the banks were begging and pleading for Congress to get in session in order to ratify the moratorium and to pass the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. But now in circulars sent out by bankers and in advertisements and stockbrokers' confidential letters Congress is blamed for the misconduct of these same bankers and stockbrokers and confidence gold-brick men.

Of course, we should adjourn when our work is finished; but, Mr. Chairman, our work is not finished until we pass some constructive legislation that will prevent several million American citizens from starving to death during the coming winter. [Applause.] Why, the President of the United States, let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the minority leader, himself is concurring with Senator WAGNER, of New York, and other leaders of Congress, real leaders of Congress, on a bill providing loans for revenue-producing projects and providing loans to States and political subdivisions of States for public works in order to stimulate industry and create employment.

Can we adjourn, Mr. Chairman, with millions of industrial workers walking the streets, and hundreds of thousands—yes, millions—of farmers, with the sheriffs marching upon their homes with foreclosure papers? We provided for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and it is doing its work. How can we sit idly by and say that after we have passed the appropriation bills and the revenue bill we should close and go home? No real statesman with vision and any understanding of the country's condition would say such a thing.

It is just as much a part of the duty of Congress to provide aid to the farmers and the unemployed workers of the country as it was its duty to pass the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act; and if I know the temper of this House I will say it will not consent to adjourn until we do pass a constructive legislative program that will stimulate industry and provide employment that will bring relief so much needed by the farmers of the country.

We talk so much about balancing the Budget. The first thing we have to do is to balance the family budget; and not until the budgets of the American families are balanced will there be any hope of balancing the National Budget. I say that some of you gentlemen—and only a few I am glad to have noted—can sit here and applaud when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] suggests that we have completed our labors and that we have nothing else to do except to pass the appropriation bills and then go home because some discredited stockbroker and broken banker are so saying the same thing in his circulars to his clients; but I say that we have a distinct and important duty yet to perform, and that is to face the situation. Wait until some of the few gentlemen who just applauded to-day the suggestion to adjourn go home to their districts and see the bread lines and hear of the public and semipublic charity funds depleted with no hope in sight for the coming winter; the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the very few who applauded him may then learn a little about real economic conditions. Then they will realize the necessity of staying here, facing the facts, and doing something real and useful.

We can not improve conditions by saying these conditions do not exist. The distinguished Senator from the State of New York, Senator WAGNER, put into the RECORD yesterday some very illuminating information. At this time, with the great need that exists in this country, with unemployment increasing, not decreasing, I say we dare not adjourn Congress and go home without doing something constructive and something to bring relief to millions of American unemployed and to the needy American farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as upon the request of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks I sympathetically and gladly introduced the House bill, it devolves upon me to say a few words, at any rate, in support of this measure. The reasonableness of the proposal appears on its face and needs no discussion. So I would use this time to call attention to the fact that in legislation of this type we are beginning to pursue a course that now has been followed in Great Britain for 50 years, more or less, and that must be pursued here if the House is to free itself from the petty administrative detail which now takes so much time, to the exclusion of attention to more important matters.

In the course of this half century Parliament has gradually developed a system under which petty administrative detail is quickly handled. It may take one of three courses. A subject may be intrusted to an administrative board or officer, with power to act, and the provision that his action shall be laid before the House of Commons at the opening of the next session or while it is in session. This gives the House of Commons an opportunity to annul the action if it sees fit. It is the course proposed in this bill. We are to allow administrative boards to act, but we secure to Congress notice of the fact at the earliest practicable moment, thus calling it to the attention of Congress, which, of course, can annul the action if it deems the action unwise.

The second course that measures may take in Parliament is for the administrative official or board to act, the action to be final unless Parliament rejects it within a specified time after the convening of the House of Commons. The regulations thus issued are known as provisional orders, and the provisional order book laid before the House of Commons at every session is very much larger than the volume containing the enactments of that session.

The third course, that which is prescribed for the most important matters, is for the administrative board or official to prepare the legislation, which is to take effect if and when Parliament approves.

Mark you, for the smallest things the action of the administrative officer or board is final unless and until Parliament proceeds to disapprove. For the next larger matters the action is final if Parliament does not act within a specified time. Under the third course the act of the administrative officer or board is final when Parliament acts.

This system must be adopted in this country, both in Congress and the State legislatures, if we are to return our activities to matters of principle and policy. Eventually time will permit no more than that, and already time is so pressing that we with difficulty cope with the little matters that now encumber our machinery.

For that reason I welcomed the opportunity to introduce this particular bill. It is not of great importance in itself, but it is setting an example which the Congress must more and more follow in order to free itself from the minutiæ of administrative legislation.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest some days ago to a speech delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. He stated that the time has arrived when we should go back to the Constitution. I fully agree with him, but to do this we will first have to take the Government back to the people.

Under a Republican administration for the past 12 years the average business and the great masses of the people have not been considered in legislation and administrative policies. I charge that because of the type of Republican policy, largely controlled by special interests—big business—we have gotten the Government and the Congress in dutch with the people. There is too much secrecy in Government and in the administration of departmental affairs. I find—and you will find out this summer when you go back to the people, if you have not already done so—that the people who feed and clothe the world and pay the expenses of the greatest Government on the face of the earth are beginning to realize that there is something wrong and they are prying in on the inside workings of the Government. You have gone along creating bureaus, commissions, and adding thousands of employees to the Government pay rolls at good salaries at the expense of the taxpayer without the consent or any special knowledge of the great masses of the people. You have given special privileges and protection by legislation and otherwise to well-organized groups with the hope that these groups would shake a few crumbs from the table to those laboring in industry and those who have been sweating blood to feed and clothe the world.

You have passed major pieces of legislation and in so doing have talked loud and long about the benefits labor and agriculture would get out of same. However, when these pieces of legislation are signed by the President and pass into the hands of various departments, boards, and commissions whose duty it is to interpret and administer same, the people you talked about are eliminated from the picture. For instance, take the act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is supposed to see that the public, agriculture, and labor get a square deal. Who is it that pays the highest freight rates that we have ever had with all competition on the part of railroads wiped out by this commission? Why those who were to get a square deal. Recently freight rates were increased at the expense of the public, whereas private and governmental agencies are reducing expenses. Let us take the Tariff Commission and the emergency tariff act for farmers. Everybody knows that industry is protected by the highest tariff rates to-day at the expense of business, labor, and agriculture that we have ever had.

In the meantime practically everybody knows that you can not make the tariff apply on practically any farm product, yet it was a "farmers' tariff bill." You are not even fair in dealing with the tariff policy. If you were you would put a tariff on jute that is flooding this country at the expense of the cotton farmer. Why just go back and take a look on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when the Farm Board marketing act was up for consideration. This bill was to be the last word in saving agriculture, and about all farmers have received is advice on the part of the board to plow up every third row of cotton.

Let us take the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act passed by the present Congress. It was especially created to make loans to banks so as to put them in a position to loan to agriculture. We find, however, that railroads have gotten plenty and banks just enough to put them in a better position to take care of withdrawals of deposits, which is very good, but not enough to enable them to make additional loans. It was also expressly understood that it would loan to closed banks so as to enable them to pay off depositors, thereby placing millions in the hands of depositors which would be placed in the channels of business, and this is the main reason I voted for the bill. I have been trying to help a number of closed banks in my district, but without very much success. When an application is passed upon favorably the bank gets a very small loan compared with the amount of collateral pledged, which is usually about all of the good paper they have on hand.

During this session of Congress a bill was passed appropriating $125,000,000 for Federal land banks. It was stated by the proponents of the bill that it was to enable land banks to extend payments of farmers' mortgages and to make additional loans. What has happened? Thousands of farms are still going on the block and it has to be a No. 1 risk to get a new loan. A number of us tried to amend the bill so as to force the board to extend payments on loans, but it was voted down, and I voted against the bill. The Agricultural Committee reported and the Congress passed a $10,000,000 bill to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to farmers to establish production credit corporations. I have not heard of even one being established in South Carolina. I refer to those various matters for the reason that the public, and especially my constituents, should know that in blaming Congress for everything on the face of the earth that they should give the individual Congressman credit for his efforts and actual record.

The average legitimate business, labor, and agriculture have stood for the things I have talked about because they have been satisfied with having an opportunity to make a living and keep going. In the meanwhile you have allowed these organized groups to use tariff rates, increased freight rates, or their monopolistic powers to control and fix prices, including the cost of production, overhead expenses, tariff rates, and a profit, all of which is passed on to labor and agriculture.

This has worked well until now we find millions unemployed, agriculture bled to death, and therefore unable to absorb these fixed charges, and it is beginning to paralyze the octopus that has about sucked their victims white. If farmers were able to-day to fix fair prices on their products like these organized corporations, you would not have to worry about unemployment, business, or revenue to run the Government.

The serious condition that exists to-day did not just happen, and I charge that it would not have happened if those in authority would have functioned in the interest of all the people. The thing I really want to speak to you about which is in line with what I have been saying is that the great masses of people, for which a few of us are laboring day in and out, have little chance to get a square deal under the present policy of government.

I want to give you a fair sample of what I have been trying to discuss with you. About 12 months ago the steel manufacturers and Barrett Co. requested the Secretary of the Treasury to make an investigation, charging that foreign countries were shipping sulphate of ammonia into the United States at a price below that for which the same product was being sold in foreign countries. I have been protesting during these months to the Secretary of the Treasury against the placing of a tax on this fertilizer, especially at a time when farmers are struggling for their very existence.

I called to the attention of the Secretary that it was unfair to make Government loans to farmers to buy fertilizer and then place a tax thereon taking back at least a part of the very money loaned them. The steel manufacturers are highly protected on steel with a tariff, but they are not satisfied with this protection. They want a bounty on sulphate of ammonia, which is manufactured by them as a by-product. These manufacturers claim that the price of imported sulphate of ammonia is so cheap that it is injuring their business. I asked the Secretary, in discussing this charge, if he would take into consideration the injury it would bring to 30,000,000 farmers who would have to pay this tax. I was told that they were not concerned about farmers and that the antidumping act did not refer to farmers.

I then requested the privilege of seeing the evidence submitted by the manufacturers, but was refused, as they had promised to hold all evidence in strict confidence. Now, this is the thing I am trying to get over to you. Here comes one of these highly tariff protected groups requesting an additional tax placed on the unorganized and unprotected groups. In the meantime this group of farmers and those of us who are interested in trying to protect an already bankrupt agriculture are frankly told, "Under our policy we keep those things a "secret" and have so promised these manufacturers." As stated, the people have withstood these unfair charges until they have been bled white. I want to warn Members and these officials high up in the Government here and now that unless the great masses of the people are considered as a part of the Government, which is due them under the Constitution, and are given an opportunity to sit in and pass upon these acts of the Government that are held in secret, whereby special interests are receiving special benefits at the expense of the people, it will not be long before these people will rise up and destroy those in authority.

What are the facts in the nitrate-of-soda combination case? For years we have had a hog-tied Nitrate of Soda Trust functioning right in the face of the Government and robbing the American farmers out of millions of dollars annually. As stated, farmers paid the price with a protest, but received no relief at the hands of their Government.

A similar monopoly existed in the sale of sulphate of ammonia until about 12 months ago, when it fell through. It is a known fact that after this happened the manufacturers here, through their sole agency, Barrett Co., tried to get the continuance of this monopoly, but Germany would not stand hitched.

Now, under a promise of "secrecy" by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Steel Trust and Barrett Co., they propose to bring about the same results that would accrue under a combination, but under a taxing scheme.

I want to quote at this point my letter addressed to Mr. A. A. Ballantine, Under Secretary of the Treasury, who conducted these hearings, and his reply thereto. In my letter you have my plea for farmers and a notice of the introduction of my resolution. In Mr. Ballantine's reply, paragraph 4, you will note his promise to the manufacturers that he would hold their evidence in confidence.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 28, 1392.

MR. ARTHUR A. BALLANTINE,
Department of Treasury, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BALLANTINE: You remember, in testifying before you some days ago opposing the placing of a duty on sulphate of ammonia, I requested the privilege of reviewing the finding of the investigation division of your department and the testimony given by the proponents of the proposition, but was refused. In this request I can assure you it was not a matter of reflecting on your judgment in passing upon this matter, but to be unable to review the evidence and testimony submitted by the proponents is absolutely ridiculous.

I note from Commissioner Eble that the proponents object to the Members of Congress and others interested in agriculture having the privilege of looking over these files. I have therefore introduced a resolution, which I hope to have passed by the House within the near future, calling for all testimony, evidence, and documents which will place you in the proper position to submit same, regardless of the views of the proponents. In the meantime I again want to call to your attention the serious agricultural situation and beg of you, regardless of the evidence submitted by the manufacturers of sulphate of ammonia in the United States, that you as promptly as possible make your decision against the placing of a tax burden on agriculture at this time.

Thanking you in advance for your courtesy in this matter, I am

Sincerely yours,

H. P. FULMER, M. C.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 10, 1932.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am sorry that your letter of April 28 has gone unacknowledged owing to pressure of matters relating to the revenue bill. I have read the copy of the resolution which you have introduced in Congress, House Resolution 206, calling for all information, testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records pertaining to the investigation which has been conducted in the department on ammonium sulphate dumping questions under the antidumping act, 1921.

In passing the antidumping act Congress decided to provide that the initial decisions as to the existing of dumping should be made by the Treasury in accordance with administrative procedure. Under this procedure it is not the practice to have all parties present when evidence is taken or to submit the evidence from one side to the other unless in a particular case the interests involved agree to do this.

It has been the practice of the Customs Service, in acting under this statute, to treat all documents filed as confidential and not to disclose their contents unless the person filing them consents to such disclosures.

The representatives of the domestic producers of ammonium sulphate were advised of this practice, and made their statements with the understanding that the usual practice would be followed.

As I told you, the department will give the most careful and fair consideration to the evidence of both sides. I trust that you will understand why we do not feel free to comply with your request.

Very truly yours,

A. A. BALLANTINE,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives.

When the German cartel or monopolistic agreement fell through as stated, sulphate was immediately placed on the market on an open competitive basis. For the first time, so far as I am concerned, for quite a while fertilizer-mixing plants and farmers were able to buy this much-needed material at a fair price. It was a godsend to both the fertilizer-mixing plants and farmers; especially on account of the serious economic situation. In fact, it was just too good to last long. It may be that the Nitrate of Soda Trust has something to do with this; however, we are unable to get the facts, because they are held in "secrecy."

The cheapness of sulphate since the breaking up of the German monopoly has interfered very much with the Nitrate of Soda Trust. In the year 1930, 144,000 tons of nitrate were shipped into the United States from Chile through the ports of Charleston, Savannah, and Wilmington, whereas up to date this year less than 30,000 tons have been shipped in. I realize that farmers, not being able to buy the usual quantity of fertilizer, have had something to do with this reduction in tonnage, but sulphate of ammonia has largely taken its place because of the low price. Mr. Lowman, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, stated before the Ways and Means Committee while considering my resolution that sulphate of ammonia could be manufactured just as cheaply in America as in foreign countries, and I agree with him.

The following information is taken from Bulletin No. 129, issued by the Department of Agriculture, dated January, 1931:

It will be noted that the by-product ammonia is still the leading domestic source of nitrogen. This is produced at about 100 coke plants in 21 States. These plants produce about 97 per cent of the by-product ammonia, the remaining 3 per cent coming from gas works and bone-charring plants. The value of the products of the coke oven and therefore its price is not a determining factor in maintaining the prosperity of the by-product coke industry, and it is reasonable to expect that expansion will go on and production continue almost without regard to the price of this commodity.

On or about April 7 the proponents appeared before the Treasury officials in a "secret" meeting, and immediately thereafter sulphate advanced from $23 to $30 per ton at South Carolina points. My statement is absolutely borne out by a statement contained in a letter written by the agriculture commissioner of Georgia, E. C. Talmadge, as follows:

For some reason the price of sulphate of ammonia has suddenly advanced to more than $30 per ton; and I have reliable but not authenticated information that this sudden and radical advance in the price of sulphate of ammonia was due to the purchase of the supply by one large company.

It is my belief that the increased price was brought about either because it was understood on the part of these manufacturers that a tax would be placed on the importation of sulphate of ammonia, or Barrett Co. was able to corner the small amount of this product that was available at that time and thereby force this price on farmers.

Believing that there should be no "secret" dealings with a few of the people at the expense of a great majority of the people by the Government I introduced the following resolution on May 5:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to submit to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records presented in or pertaining to the investigation conducted by the Secretary of the Treasury under authority of the antidumping act, 1921 (U. S. C., title 19, secs. 160–173), relating to the importation of ammonium sulphate.

I was given a hearing by the Ways and Means Committee with the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Lowman, and Commissioner Eble appearing and vigorously opposing favorable consideration thereto. Why? Because they said the Secretary of the Treasury had promised the steel corporations and Barret Co. that he would not let anybody "see" their evidence, records, and so forth. Why, Mr. Lowman said he would be breaking a promise. Farmers have been promised by President Hoover and the Republican Party that they would be placed on an equality with the Steel Trust and other industries, but they did not mind breaking that promise. Practically every Republican on the Ways and Means Committee protested against favorable consideration of my resolution.

As you probably know, practically the entire production of sulphate of ammonia in this country is sold through Barrett Co., of New York City. Practically all of the steel mills are under the control of the United States Steel Corporation and the Bethlehem Steel Co. However, the few independent steel mills, along with these two large corporations, have an agreement with Barrett Co. by which this company is their exclusive selling agent of this product.

I have been informed by good authority that recently a representative of the Barrett Co. has been traveling through Charleston, S. C., and Savannah, Ga., calling on fertilizer manufacturers—mixing plants—trying to secure the assistance of the fertilizer manufacturers in the support of a duty on sulphate, pointing out to these fertilizer manufacturers that the cheap price of sulphate was injuring their business. I can produce evidence to substantiate this statement if it is desired.

If Barrett Co. and the manufacturers of sulphate have proof of dumping, why call upon fertilizer manufacturers requesting their assistance and influence upon the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out their taxing scheme? If we are unable to "see" the real evidence submitted, how do we know but that the Secretary has been swamped with propaganda by this already-protected group that will cause him to tax farmers?

I am very glad that the Ways and Means Committee has seen fit to report my resolution and that the House has passed same. I hope that this will be a sufficient warning to the Secretary of the Treasury to stop and take notice that those of us interested in the people and that the people who have been discriminated against are demanding equal rights under the Constitution and that they be considered as a part of the Government. In closing I want to state some facts as I see them relative to the present economic situation and suggest an emergency relief plan. For the past 10 years agriculture has been growing worse financially. Unemployment is spreading, family reserves are gone, another winter is coming, all classes are helpless, confidence has departed, fear is rampant.

It is merciless, resistless, encircling unemployment—out of work, out of position, out of a job—that afflicts and decimates and rests like a curse all over the land. The cure is beyond the resources and control of States and municipalities. Many will break down under the burden. Some of the bills passed this session are very good, but they do not go deep enough nor to the seat of the trouble. The present situation is much worse than the one following the World War. Either the dollar will have to be deflated or fair prices will have to be fixed on agricultural products. Minimum prices were fixed and maintained by the Government after the war, so why not do it now as an emergency relief measure? [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, on May 6, just past, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] indulged himself, this House, and the country in an indefensible diatribe against an upright, able Christian gentleman from my district, one who disagrees with him upon the eighteenth amendment. His attack was also a veiled criticism against the Methodist Church. I refer to the Rev. Deets Pickett, an honored minister of my district.

After a citation of the testimony of Reverend Pickett before a Senate investigating committee, in which the Reverend Pickett testified, in substance, that neither he nor his organization had shipped any packages, the gentleman from Massachusetts produced a receipt, in which the consignor appeared to be the board of temperance, for 11 packages, which were trucked to Baltimore on or about the day the gentleman from Massachusetts held his investigation. Then the gentleman drew from that circumstantial evidence his own conclusions.

Can there be any other inference drawn from the removal of these packages the day upon which I asked the committee to subpœna the books of that organization than that the board hastened to remove and secrete incriminating documents?

Then he prefers this criminal charge:

In the light of this indisputable evidence I charge that Deets Pickett was guilty of perjury in his testimony before the Senate committee, and I call upon the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute him for this offense.

I notified the gentleman from Massachusetts by letter the other day that the very first opportunity I had to take the floor I would reply to these charges.

The Constitution of the United States, section 6, Article I, provides that for language spoken on this floor a Member shall not be charged to answer elsewhere.

This is a wise provision of the Constitution, otherwise truthful statements made in good faith would be used to annoy a Member so as to destroy his usefulness here; but I submit that the very existence of this great privilege would suggest to one who uses it, especially to criticize and disparage another, that the highest degree of care should be exercised. I know of nothing so cowardly as for a Member, clothed with that privilege, to take this floor to malign one who is thus rendered helpless to rectify it.

I have investigated these charges. It appears that there was a shipment of 11 packages on that day from the Methodist Building over here to Baltimore. It was a perfectly innocent shipment and was not made either by the organization referred to or by Reverend Pickett, its secretary.

Some years ago the Baltimore Methodist, a church publication, was transferred to Washington and became the Christian Advocate. It ceased publication some five or six years ago. Its property was stored in the basement of the Methodist Building, and as a coincidence merely, on the day referred to by the gentleman the owners of that property consigned it to Baltimore as the property of the Methodist Historical Society. It consisted merely of historical documents, picture of a bishop, and other property totally unrelated to the subject about which the gentleman was inquiring.

I read these telegrams received by me from eminent clergymen who know of the transactions:

Eleven packages, contents unknown to us, received at house 4104 North Charles Street from Washington April 10, 1930, and also picture of Bishop Waugh, which we were requested to store by Rev. Dr. Edward L. Watson, account of the Methodist Historical Society. The 11 packages are still intact and in same condition as when received, and can only be examined by the proper authorities.

RALPH J. TAYLOR.

When Christian Advocate closed up under Doctor Swartz he asked me if I wished to receive the remains as president of the Methodist Historical Society; that they consisted of bound volumes, cuts, etc. I asked a friend to receive them. They are at an address on Charles Street. Swartz knows what is in them. I have not yet had time to open them.

E. L. WATSON.

This is the Rev. E. L. Watson, now a pastor in Baltimore, former editor of Baltimore Methodist. I have received this telegram:

I was editor of Washington Christian Advocate, formerly the Baltimore Methodist, and had my office in the Methodist Building, Washington, D. C. The paper ceased publication the last of July, 1926. I vacated my office in Methodist Building October 1, 1926. The valuable papers and other material to be preserved were deposited in a storage room in the basement of the Methodist Building, where they remained several years. In the spring of 1930 the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, from whom I had rented my office, wrote me to Sunbury, Pa., where I was then living, requesting that the material be removed. I came to Washington and spent two days collecting material for preservation. Since the Washington Christian Advocate had formerly been the Baltimore Methodist, it seemed fitting that these valuable documents and property should be placed in the custody of the Methodist Historical Society of Baltimore. I therefore shipped the files of the Baltimore Methodist and the Washington Christian Advocate, bound and unbound, historic papers, and valuable cuts to 4104 North Charles Street, Baltimore, which address was given me by Dr. E. L. Watson, president of the Methodist Historical Society, who said he would arrange for permanent care. The package composed one shipment by motor express that contained nothing that in any way pertained to any other organization or institution than the two papers mentioned above; that contained absolutely nothing that had anything to do with the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals. Doctor Watson has told me since coming here that these packages have never been opened.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Kentucky has been here for years and has been quite active. Has the gentleman ever heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] make a speech on this floor except when he was attacking Bishop Cannon or Dr. Clarence True Wilson or the Methodist Church?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes; in trying to reduce the representation of the white people of the South. His career has been distinguished by a seeming antipathy to them.

Mr. BLANTON. Outside of those matters, has the gentleman ever heard the gentleman from Massachusetts make a speech on any question on this floor?

Mr. GILBERT. No.

Mr. BLANTON. For the benefit of the new Members, who probably do not know him, will the gentleman from Kentucky mind describing the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], so that the new Members may know something about him?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman does that, would he not like to have a larger audience?

Mr. GILBERT. No, sir. As this matter has gone to the country from this floor, I merely feel we should have the truth follow it also from here.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Briefly; yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman has spoken about the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. I am one of the young Members whom the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has corrupted.

Mr. GILBERT. So the red fire of the gentleman from Massachusetts has burned down to fuss and feathers. Nothing so surely measures a man as his use and abuse of power. The press and the courts were open to the gentleman from Massachusetts; and if he had desired that the full facts of this circumstantial evidence should be given to the country, he should have first given it to the grand jury before broadcasting it through this public forum.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield on that? The gentleman from Massachusetts did cause a bishop to be haled before the grand jury and got him indicted, and then the chief justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia held that the indictment did not charge any offense and dismissed it, quashed it, and it is now on appeal.

Mr. GILBERT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had felt sure that Reverend Pickett had committed perjury, why did he select this forum, where he would be immune from the civil redress of Reverend Pickett?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is no doubt but that the gentleman from Massachusetts thoroughly understands his constitutional right of immunity, because I understand he exercised it in a libel suit against him.

Mr. GILBERT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had continued his snooping through which he found out the existence of the shipment, he could have found out what it contained. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had continued his snooping, he could have found out that the gentleman whom he charged had nothing to do with the shipment, and he could have learned that he had the privilege, which he has now, of making a personal examination of these packages and learning what they contain. These packages are still intact and unopened.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why did not the gentleman from Kentucky answer him at the time, and not do it now, when there are only perhaps 75 Members present and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is not present to defend himself?

Mr. GILBERT. I notified him that I was going to make this speech. I was not present when the gentleman made his charges, and had I been I could not then have known their truth or falsity.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I should like to have heard what the gentleman from Massachusetts said about it, and there would have been more fun. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman did not give Mr. Pickett notice, but I did give the gentleman notice. I can not state why the gentleman from Massachusetts is not here. It has been suggested that he does not appear here often.

Now, it happens that Deets Pickett is secretary of the Methodist board, and a militant advocate of prohibition, an organization that arouses the wrath of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That board has as much right to uphold the eighteenth amendment as the gentleman from Massachusetts has to tear it down. [Applause.]

Mr. Pickett is by birth, environment, and life work devoted to the prohibition cause. He and his people for generations have been fighting alcoholic indulgence and the human debasement and misery that we all know are its consequence.

His father was the nominee for President on the prohibition ticket, and devoted his life to the work his son is now carrying on. His mother is president of the Kentucky Woman's Christian Temperance Union and has devoted her life to the cause to which she is so devoted and in which she so sincerely believes.

It is poor sportsmanship and poor statesmanship for one to abuse and slander those who disagree with him. We may disagree as to the wisdom of the eighteenth amendment, but we can not disagree that its aims and purposes are most commendable and its supporters most sincere, nor can we fail to respect the motives of the godly men and women, the high ideals and noble sentiments of those who fought for 70 years to put it into the Constitution of the United States. It comes with poor grace for a Member to take this floor and slander one whom, in my opinion, he would not meet elsewhere. The long career of the gentleman from Massachusetts has been distinguished here for animus toward the white people of the South and for personal attacks against those who uphold the traditions and sentiments of that section.

The South is the section of the country from which the Reverend Pickett comes and where the sentiment for the eighteenth amendment is the strongest.

From the gentleman's career I am justified in the belief that had the gentleman from Massachusetts been here during the dark days that followed the Civil War he would have taken his place side by side with Charles Sumner, and Thaddeus Stevens and those others who sought to undermine and destroy the wise and kindly policies of Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson.

But let me say in conclusion that if the gentleman from Massachusetts would devote his time and talents in an attempt to relieve the misery and distress that surrounds us, rather than to vindictively assault and recklessly slander those who differ with him, his services would be more valuable to this House, to his country, and to his God. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GILBERT Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman read the bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] against birth control, which he tried to withdraw the other day and which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] prevented him from withdrawing?

Mr. GILBERT. No; I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. He got that in here by mistake, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Federal and District authorities administering properties within the District of Columbia owned by the United States or by the said District are hereby authorized to transfer jurisdiction over parts or all of such properties among or between themselves for purposes of administration and maintenance under such conditions as may be mutually agreed upon: Provided, That prior to the consummation of any transfer hereunder such proposed transfer shall be recommended by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission: Provided further, That all such transfers and agreements shall be reported to Congress by the authorities concerned.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the provisions of any existing law or laws authorizing the transfer of jurisdiction of certain lands between and among Federal and District authorities, but all such laws shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLIVER of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2498, to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public lands in the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Education.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Education I call up the bill H. R. 4743, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment," approved June 2, 1920, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill H. R. 4743. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4743, with Mr. OLIVER of New York in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with a discussion of the bill I would like to make some arrangement in respect to time. I understand that two hours are to be used in discussion in general debate. I ask that one hour of that time be given to the ranking member on the committee on the Republican side, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any member of the committee opposed to the bill who seeks recognition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the committee, but I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill? The Chair hears no response. Therefore the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for one hour in opposition to the bill.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this bill came before our committee on the presentation of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. The bill as it originally came before the committee asked for a continuing act with an appropriation of $1,500,000 a year and an increase of $20,000 in the administration fund. After long hearings, lasting three days, and upon mature consideration in executive session, the Committee on Education felt that it would be wise to amend the bill and cut out the provision for an increase of $500,000 in the appropriation. First, I shall review briefly the history of the legislation. On June 2, 1920, an act was passed establishing, in cooperation with the States, the service of vocational rehabilitation for all physically handicapped persons, and under the act of 1920 the work was to be continued for four years. The appropriation for the year 1921 was $750,000, and for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 the appropriation was $1,000,000 annually. The work was found to be sucessful, and its continuation desirable. By act of June 5, 1924, the service was further continued for a period of six years, with the same appropriation of $1,000,000 annually, to June 30, 1930. By act of June 9, 1930, the service was further continued for three years, and that act ends on June 30, 1933. The last act contained the $1,000,000 annual appropriation. The present bill, as reported by our committee, provides for a continuation of the work for four years from the expiration of the next fiscal year. In other words, beginning on July 1, 1934, the successful work for the rehabilitation of those disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil life would continue with an appropriation of $1,000,000 annually for four years more.

That briefly is what your committee reports. I do not understand that there is to be any serious substantial objection to the passage of this bill. Let me say very frankly as the chairman of the Committee on Education that I am not one of those who are strong believers in the 50-50 appropriations. I believe that in education, or in any other field, where the work can be done by the States, it should be done by the States, and I am always among the last to appropriate Federal money for any State purpose. Although that is my state of mind, and I know it to be the state of mind of many on the committee, yet I feel, and I feel strongly, that this service is so exceptional that we can well continue it.

What are we trying to do under this rehabilitation act? We are trying to save men—human beings. We are trying to return to the community to be useful and productive citizens those who have had the misfortune by disease, by accident in industry, or even upon the streets from automobiles, to be so disabled that their usefulness as citizens is greatly diminished, and their productiveness as citizens is greatly diminished, and they are likely to become public charges.

My strong support for this bill comes from the fact that I am impressed by this: Last year the average cost of rehabilitation, per case, was $221.83. The figures from the various States show that it costs from $300 to $500 annually to maintain, in idleness, at State expense, in poorhouses and other institutions, such persons as are disabled and need rehabilitation, but do not receive it, but become burdens upon the communities. In other words, this bill is purely an economic measure at the bottom.

If we do not save and rehabilitate those injured and disabled citizens of ours (most of them, as a matter of fact, seem to be heads of families with many dependents), and if we do not meet that low expense of $221 for the care and rehabilitation of such men, then the States will pay a sum varying from $300 to $500 to take care of those same persons in poorhouses. Now, that is the whole story.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The amount authorized in this bill is the same amount that has been heretofore authorized to be expended annually, is it not?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Exactly. The committee felt, and I think rightly, that no matter what might be the argument for an increase of the amount, this was hardly the time to grant an increase. Knowing, as we did, the sentiment of the House in the matter of economy, we did not feel justified in going farther than the present law.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Does the law not provide for the care and treatment of those who are injured on the farms as well as those injured in the cities?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Absolutely. It takes care of any person who is injured or who suffers from disease, those injured in industry, those injured upon the farms, and those injured upon the streets. It is most humane, and it is not merely charitable, because it is an economy bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. About how many men and women are being rehabilitated?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. According to the figures at my disposal we have already rehabilitated surely 50,000 in years past. May I give that in detail a little later?

Mr. SIROVICH. Also which State has the largest number and which State the smallest number rehabilitated?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I think I can get those figures for the gentleman's information very shortly. Naturally we would find the largest number of rehabilitations in the States having the largest population. New York, for example.

I would state for the information of the committee that 44 of the 48 States have come under the provisions and benefits of this act. Only four States have remained out, and that in itself is proof of the successful working of this service.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Is it not a fact that the State of Missouri has abandoned this practice after a trial of three or four years?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will not be sure of that, but if they have I do not know their reasons, but I think they have made a mistake.

Mr. PALMISANO. Have not some of the States, particularly those engaged in farming, abandoned that practice?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Perhaps they have. I am not informed particularly on that point. I do know that at present 44 States take advantage of the rehabilitation act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman's own State of Maryland not taken advantage of this act and accomplished great results?

Mr. PALMISANO. To be frank, it cost, according to a letter received from the director, of Maryland, $760 a year from 1929 down to 1931.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. The answer to that is that in other States the cost is not so high. The State of Maryland is not getting the benefit of the investigation it should make of the cost of the act.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield farther?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Does not the history of this work under this legislation show that a great many States are now giving their attention to this by reason of getting Federal aid, which had been neglecting it for years before?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I am satisfied from my study of this subject, that while I am opposed to Federal aid as a rule, the fact that the Federal Government has taken over this economic and useful work has caused the States to take up the work themselves, and they have seen the profit to their citizens.

The reason we ask this legislation at this time, one year in advance, is that, as the system works, the State itself first determines the number of cases to be rehabilitated. The State then goes ahead with the work, and that work is approved by the Federal Rehabilitation Board, and after they are satisfied that the work is progressing properly, then the Federal allotment is made to the State in question. So that the States are really one year ahead of the Federal board. Therefore this act must be approved at this time in order to take care of the fiscal year 1934.

In answer to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], may I point out this: Since its inception in 1920 you will find from the report of the committee, which is based upon the report of the Vocational Training Board itself, that over 50,000 disabled persons have been rehabilitated and rendered self-supporting. At present 25,000 are being served. In the past year 5,192 persons were rehabilitated and placed in employment; 2,455 have been trained, but at the close of the year were awaiting employment, and 869 persons have been trained, but were under observation.

Thus during the year 8,516 people were rehabilitated and fitted for employment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the testimony before the committee show the amount of funds that have been distributed to the States in the various years under the respective appropriations?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That may not be found in the report of the committee, but it is to be found in the report of the Federal Vocational Board itself. I can furnish those figures a little later.

Mr. STAFFORD. The author of the bill, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], has favored me with a copy of the hearings, which shows these amounts, and I am grateful to the gentleman from Alabama and also to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED of New York. In the State of Wisconsin the Federal-aid and State funds available for vocational rehabilitation for the year ending June 30, 1921, were $115,446.26, of which $51,325 was from Federal funds, and $64,121.26 from local funds.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have before me, through the courtesy of my friend the gentleman from Alabama, the author of the bill, a statement showing that Wisconsin received for the biennial period 1930–31, $51,325.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin that Wisconsin is one of the leaders in this movement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not need to acquaint me with that fact. Not only the whole country, but the whole world knows Wisconsin is the leader in all progressive legislation of this character.

I want to get the total cost for Wisconsin; that is, how much the State of Wisconsin appropriated and how much it received from the National Government. I notice from the statistics just furnished me that outside of Illinois, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and Oregon, Wisconsin shows the largest amount expended for this special service.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman tell us why, on page 2, line 23, the committee changed the amount carried in the original bill from $65,000 to $97,000 and raised that amount, which is a limitation on the $1,000,000?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is to take care of the minimum allotments. The bill appropriates over $1,000,000. Under the bill each State must receive as a minimum $10,000. The $1,000,000 is appropriated proportionately to the population of the States according to the last census. Under that apportionment some States would not receive the full amount of $10,000. So the extra $97,000 in this case is to provide for the difference between the apportionment allotment and the $10,000 contained in the minimum allotment provision.

Mr. GOSS. How is the money allotted to the States?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. It is apportioned according to population.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that, but I mean under this provision?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. There must be a minimum allotment of $10,000.

Mr. GOSS. That is what I am asking about; how is that minimum allotment apportioned?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. By the law. Each State must receive $10,000. Under the proportional population allotment a number of them would not receive that much. The $97,000 takes care of that situation.

Mr. GOSS. So it appears that certain States were not able to take up their full allotment to the extent of $32,000; is that right?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. What States were those?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will give the gentleman that information. To be sure to have that information for the House I requested the Chief of the Federal Board for Vocational Education to write me a letter on the subject, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in its entirety. This letter was received in reply to a request for information on that very point, and this will be the best answer I can give. The letter is addressed to me as chairman of the committee:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
Washington, March 2, 1932.

Hon. JOHN J. DOUGLASS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DOUGLASS: In response to your request, I am submitting herein an explanation of the operation of that provision in our present rehabilitation act guaranteeing to the States a minimum allotment of $10,000 per annum.

The present act authorizes the distribution of $1,000,000 annually to the States to be allotted on the basis of their respective populations. On this basis, 17 States, inclusive of Hawaii, receive as their portions of the $1,000,000 sums in each case less than $10,000. For illustration, Arizona's share is $3,174.23, while Colorado's share is $8,925.64.

There is, however, a further provision in the act that no State shall receive less than $10,000 in any year as its allotment. Hence in the case of these 17 States, a supplementary appropriation is provided in the amount of $97,000 per annum. Of this amount, the State of Arizona, for example, receives $6,825.76, and the State of Colorado, $1,074.36. These amounts are the differences between their population allotments and the $10,000 minimum.

I am inclosing a table of the allotments for the "minimum" States, which illustrates the points in question. The allotments are given on the two bases, namely, $1,000,000 and $1,500,000.

In conclusion, it should be noted that had your committee reported the bill with an authorization of $1,500,000 per year instead of $1,000,000 per year, the population allotments of the several States would have been increased 50 per cent. This would have resulted in several of the 17 States mentioned above receiving a population allotment in excess of $10,000 and brought the others nearer to that sum. Hence the total amount of the supplementary appropriation needed would have been approximately 50 per cent less than that now provided in the present act, which allots $1,000,000 to the States on the basis of population and $97,000 for supplementary appropriations guaranteeing the $10,000 minimum.

Very truly yours,

JOHN J. KRATZ,
Chief Vocational Rehabilitation.

Mr. GOSS. So that really the population in the States that can not draw $10,000 would get a much greater allotment than the other States.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. They do in a sense.

Mr. GOSS. Has the gentleman a list of those States which do not come within that class?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I have the list right here.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman put that in the RECORD?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. GOSS. How many States do not qualify for the $10,000?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. There are 17, I think.

Mr. PALMISANO. Is Maryland among them?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. No; Maryland is not among them.

Mr. PALMISANO. How much has Maryland received from this fund? Does it exceed $5,000?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will give me a little time, I will give him that information. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is pressed for time, I will be glad to yield the gentleman some of the time at my disposal.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is all right. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GOSS. To further pursue the matter, it will be noticed the State of Arizona by population is entitled to $3,000 under the bill.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes; therefore, under the law we would have to supply to Arizona the difference between $3,174.23 and the guaranty of $10,000, which is $6,825.76.

Mr. GOSS. So that in all previous laws there has not been a minimum of $10,000?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. There has been a minimum all the time.

Mr. GOSS. That is a new feature in this bill?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. No; that has been the provision at all times. There is a change in the bill as introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the bill as amended by the committee. The bill as introduced calls for $65,000 for minimum allotments. Of course, if the bill calling for $1,500,000 went through—which it will not—then $65,000 would be enough to take care of those 17 States' minimum allotments, because the board would have $1,500,000 each year to allot, but under this bill the board only gets $1,000,000 a year to allot.

Mr. GOSS. So there has been no change in practice in this bill over what has happened in the past?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. The bill makes no change in the present practice. We are following in this bill what has been the law for 12 years.

Mr. GOSS. Does anyone inquire as to whether Arizona needs the extra money or is it just simply handed to Arizona and these other 17 States regardless of their needs?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Not regardless of their needs, because the whole matter is supervised by the Federal Board for Vocational Rehabilitation, and the gentleman may be sure that board does not make an allotment unless it knows it is being properly expended.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Is it not a fact that less than $10,000 would not be sufficient to maintain an organization in any State?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that it has to be matched by the State?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give us any information as to why in some States there are so many more subjects who are entitled to this rehabilitation than in other States?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. In a populous State, where you would have thousands of automobiles running over the roads, for example, there would be many more chances of automobile accidents, and people who are injured in such accidents would come under the purview of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. According to the table on page 13 of the hearings Alabama has 1,259 on the live roll and Michigan—which certainly is a great automobile State—has 1,246.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. From the very fact that this service covers accidents I can not guarantee or determine the figures in any State. There might be a thousand accidents in one State to-night and 2,000 in another State the next day.

Mr. STAFFORD. There does not seem to be any harmony as to population or any other standard.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. The greater the population and the larger the number of industries in a given State the greater is the need for this act, because more people in that State would be likely to be injured.

Mr. STAFFORD. This table does not confirm that statement. It shows that in agricultural States they have as many cases for rehabilitation as in manufacturing States.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Men can be hurt on the farm with tractors; they can fall off a load of hay, and then become subject to the provisions of this act. There is no discrimination between injuries received on the farm and injuries received in the cities and no discrimination even as to those who are disabled from disease. The intent of the act is to cover all classes. It is a general law, having a general, good, honest, charitable, humane, and economical purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to get some light. May I inquire whether the explanation may not be that it is dependent upon the amount of money appropriated by those States to match the appropriations of the National Government and that that determines the number on the live roll?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I would not want to agree to that suggestion. I assume the law is properly and honestly carried out, and I can also see and know where some States have taken fuller advantage of this act than others.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. I had the privilege of serving on this committee for two years. My experience is that most of these cases come from among railroad employees, men engaged on public works, and things of that kind, and that is the reason why population does not always govern.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I might suggest in passing that this law takes in and gives the benefits to all Federal civilian employees.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Is it not true that the head of this vocational-education committee and others contend that we are not now taking care of one-tenth of the people who should be rehabilitated?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes; and that is why we need the law. That was one of the reasons why they asked for an increased appropriation. I think they honestly asked for it, but we did not give them the money. They asked for an increased appropriation because it was shown to the committee that only 1 out of 3 cases that should be brought under that act and should be rehabilitated could under the appropriation be attended to. So there is vast room for the use and the administration of this act. In other words, there are more people disabled daily than we have funds to provide for, but under the appropriation of $1,000,000, which we have been granting annually, the board has been doing the very best it can, and I think they should be helped, not by being perpetuated but by the continuation of their work for four years more. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Before the Economy Committee some time ago, when we were considering the matter of abolishing or discontinuing vocational education, we had a witness who stated that a number of cases of this kind had occurred. A disabled person had been trained, for instance, as a cigarmaker and then had lost his job or had become tired of his work, and the board proceeded to train him as a shoemaker, and that there were instances where one man had been trained for two or three different kinds of occupations. Was any testimony of that kind presented to the gentleman's committee?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I do not think that particular case was brought before our committee, but I know that many very sad cases were brought to our attention and they would far outweigh the case that the gentleman has cited. I could draw tears to your eyes if I wanted to indulge in dramatics by rehearsing to you the stories of the many unfortunates who had been rescued almost from death's door and made self-sustaining, valuable citizens under the operation of this act.

Mr. ALMON. Can the gentleman give us the names of the four States that are not taking advantage of this Federal aid?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I think I can name them from memory. The four States which have not taken advantage of the act are Delaware, Kansas, Vermont, and the State of Washington. However, we are hopeful they will come under the operation of this act within a short time.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. ARENTZ. All that the gentleman has stated about the wonderful manner in which this work is carried on under the provisions of the act is true, but does not the gentleman believe we should curb in every way possible the amount of money we are appropriating for travel and for supervision and administration in the District of Columbia? I notice at the end of the bill there is provided $80,000, which was cut from $100,000, for such expenses.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. No; $80,000 is the present law. The new bill asked for $100,000, but we did not grant the increase, holding the amount to $80,000.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think, however, my argument applies to the $80,000. I believe if we are going to make these 50-50 appropriations for the States, we should guard most carefully the so-called bureaucratic rule which is almost bound to prevail, and every dollar we spend in the District of Columbia is adding to that very thing.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. This bill does not affect the District of Columbia particularly because the District of Columbia has a continuing act and is not considered under this bill. In further answer to the gentleman I may say that I quite agree there should be proper supervision of the administration, but in the absence of any evidence before our committee that there was not proper administration of this act——

Mr. ARENTZ. I do not say there is not proper administration, but I say there is overadministration, and in every one of these bureaus I maintain there is too much money spent on that particular phase of the work.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I can not speak as to other bureaus, but I can speak as to this bureau from the evidence before the committee, and $80,000 for the administration work of this bureau, whose administrators travel throughout the country in the disposition of a fund of $1,000,000 distributed among 44 States is not too high in our estimation.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH] says that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS] is perfectly right. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the committee. Nevertheless, this is one of the things we have to guard against, because the complaint that we have coming to us from the country every day is about the amount of money that is spent here in Washington to take care of work that is being done in the States. I have no complaint about the work being carried on in the States if we are not spending too much money in overhead.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman quite frankly that upon investigation and after conducting the hearings, I do not believe $80,000, which has been allowed during the last 12 years, and which is proposed to be allowed for 4 years more under this bill, is an unfair or an unreasonable allowance. I think the $80,000 will be properly spent and that good results in the supervision of this work will accrue to the Government.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it not a fact that after 12 years the work has developed to such a point that it is necessary to allow more money to carry on properly the work of this bureau? It is not simply a matter of adding employees but of developing the service. We are dealing with a human problem and not a commercial problem.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman states the problem correctly, and I am pleased that he has brought out the fact that we are dealing with a human problem. Under the terms of this bill we are not trying, as we do in some other bills, to develop better or bigger pigs or cows; we are trying to keep men sound and in the full use of their faculties for the benefit of the States and of the Nation. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition to control the time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS], has made a very fair and comprehensive statement of the reasons for reporting this bill out of the committee, carrying $1,000,000 instead of $1,500,000, as introduced by my distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Some of us wish to increase the amount and report it out as introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]; but the committee, after carefully studying and taking into consideration the economic conditions and situation of the Treasury, decided to continue this appropriation just as it now is. So the $1,000,000 authorization carried in this bill for four years does not increase the appropriation one dime but carries it just as it is at present.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. The only change, as I understand, is respecting the allocation in reference to the distribution. You have raised the distribution a little higher, but in the aggregate it does not increase the authorization one dollar.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman from Texas is correct. It just raises the minimum allotment to States that do not receive that now.

Now, there are a few facts I want to bring out briefly, for I feel there is no material opposition to the bill, and we want to get along. I feel it important to bring these out.

I think the work has justified itself from two points, which is important to the Nation. One is I feel it has justified itself economically, and I want to give you these figures. In spite of the fact that it cost only about $221 last year for each case of rehabilitation of one of these persons.

Mr. PALMISANO. If the gentleman will yield, does not the report state it is $291?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am talking about the average.

Mr. PALMISANO. But the report states $291 is the average.

Mr. PATTERSON. The report shows that the chief of the rehabilitation service states that last year, 1931, it cost $221.83, and then it goes over the whole cost from 1924 to 1931, out of 44,829 rehabilitated, the average cost was $241.85. That is in the report of the chief of the vocational service.

We find further that the earnings of the group rehabilitated was $332,132 per year before rehabilitation.

Then, in 1927, the group had an earning capacity of $1,243,301 a year. The earning capacity of the group had increased practically as much per year as the entire cost of the Federal Government in rehabilitating these people.

So it is justified economically.

Not only can we show these figures, but the fact is that a great many States appropriated more money for carrying on the work from a local source than was appropriated by the Federal Government.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not far better for the States to assume rehabilitation of these men that are injured, and make them self-sustaining, rather than have them thrown on the various communities and have them become subject to charity? Is it not more economical for the Government generally to rehabilitate them and make them self-sustaining?

Mr. PATTERSON. There is no question about that. Now, secondly, it has justified itself socially. I believe the facts will justify the statement that a State composed of people who can maintain themselves and produce and keep from leaning on charity elevates that people. The distinguished chairman of the committee pointed out in his argument where it cost more to provide charity for one person in an institution for one year than it does to rehabilitate one of these individuals.

A lot of these people who had no hope but to look to some charitable organization or to their families are not able to go forth and be self-respecting citizens and to rear families.

I want to come to some cases that I know of personally. Having been a superintendent of schools myself and having worked in the educational field for some years, I had opportunity to come in touch not only with this kind of work but other vocational work. I have been an ardent supporter of vocational education of all kinds, because I believe it is one sort of education that our system, both National, State, and municipal, does not provide as it should. For instance, since the day of apprenticeship has been more or less done away with, we find lots of young men and women coming to maturity with very little, if any, knowledge of any vocation or training. I had that brought to me very forcibly once. As a young man I went out looking for a position, for something to do. I struck a man and told him I wanted a job. He asked me what trade or profession I was master of. It happened that I was just grown up and I was not master of anything except farming. The greatest thing in our Nation to-day to increase its productive capacity and stability is the training of young men and women in some vocation.

To get back to those who are incapacitated for some reason or another, it seems to me that nothing can show more clearly and forcibly the good in this work than to show, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS] did a while ago when he pointed out the large cost of charitable care and the cost of rehabilitation of one of those unfortunates.

I remember once I had a young man in school under me, who was about 19 years of age. He came in a wheel chair. He had no trade or profession. He had a rather bright mind; he could learn his books; but, of course, with the ordinary kind of school that I was teaching that did not prepare him for any trade or profession except perhaps to teach school. Later on, when this work came into my State, these vocational-rehabilitation people contacted this young man and they taught him the trade of a jeweler, which he could continue in his wheel chair and go to his office. This he did, and he built up a very fine business and is now one of the respectable citizens in one of the towns in my district.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I know the gentleman has given considerable thought to this idea. Graduating from high and grammar schools in June of this year will be some 500,000 young people. Last year an equal number graduated, and very few of those young men who graduated last year have been able to find work.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is correct.

Mr. ARENTZ. These young men who graduate in June will have nothing but idleness to face. Go throughout this Nation and talk with the chief of police anywhere and he will tell you that his problem to-day is the young man floating around with nothing to do, having no vocation, no trade. I think something must be done by the different organizations throughout our country, by the fraternal organizations and the chambers of commerce and any other organization that we have, to act as a sort of father to these young men.

Mr. PATTERSON. Vocational education will do that. In spite of the depression, we find the earning capacity of all those who have been rehabilitated has not decreased as much as that of the average citizen, and their positions have been more secure than those of the average citizen of our country, so I hope this bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ELLZEY].

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ELLZEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is one of the most meritorious bills this Congress has considered. In the first place, I consider this legislation economic, and I certainly favor rigid economy. In my humble judgment, any time that you relieve society of a responsibility by taking a man who belongs to the underprivileged class and making him self-supporting it is an economic factor worthy of most careful consideration. I hold before me the picture of a man who is helpless, dependent, with a dim vision of life's opportunities. After having received vocational training the opposite picture presents the same man as a self-respecting and self-supporting citizen. The fact remains that society has been relieved of that burden. This is a very meritorious measure, and one of the most worthy causes, in my judgment, that we have before the Congress.

In the second place, the dependent and unfortunate man in life, who is so well portrayed in this picture I hold before you, of necessity diminishes the producing ability of the man who is self-supporting and independent. Surely some one has to take care of the dependent. Society must support him. Therefore he helps to decrease the productive ability of the strong citizen. For that reason, certainly I favor this legislation.

My third reason is because there has never been a time in the history of this Nation when there was a more urgent need for this type of legislation. I am advised that the State of Nebraska has now, on an average, 41 accidents per month. That State has a population of 1,340,000. I repeat, there has never been a time in our history when we had more casualties, more than we had during the World War. Just think of it—41 accidents per month in a population of 1,340,000.

Then, the fourth reason is because of the justice to the underprivileged class. Imagine yourself being in the condition of the man shown in this picture. He is helpless, and naturally despondent. He is pessimistic. On the other hand, when he has had this training, at a most reasonable cost to the Government and to the State, he has a new vision of life. He is inspired with a desire to render a real service to mankind. He has his self-respect, and is independent as he goes down the pathway of life. Gentlemen, this is a most worthy cause.

With your permission, I want to place in the RECORD some reports showing what has actually been accomplished in several States along this line.

This young man whose picture you observe hails from the State of Ohio:

Age: 21 years—married.
Education: Sixth grade.
A. P.: Suffered a double leg amputation in a railroad accident. He had been counterman in a restaurant, and an elevator operator. After his accident he was selling pencils on a street corner.
His friends said: "He is young, in excellent health, not bad looking, and we want to give him a chance."
Artificial limbs were bought, and he was placed at a sedentary job painting valves at $15 per week.

I have another case here. This picture shows a young man from North Carolina. One picture shows him in his helpless condition. In the other you observe him as the producer. Society has been relieved of a responsibility.

Billy used a wheel chair and crutches in moving from place to place, and made rather poor progress even with these aids. After three months' stay in the hospital under a competent orthopedic surgeon, Billy began to walk some.
Almost at once he requested that the rehabilitation department furnish him training in radio repairing. Arrangements were made with Auten's, the leading radio shop in a North Carolina city, for Billy to get some practical training and experience in repairing radios, and this was supplemented by a correspondence course.
From the very start Billy made good. His quiet demeanor, sunny disposition, and native ability, coupled with the desire to do, won him a place in the heart of everyone connected with the establishment.
Now, something over three years later, we find Billy carrying on as head mechanic in the same shop where he received his training. He is earning a good living and is happy in his work.

Next, allow me to present the case of a more mature man. This gentleman hails from the State of Illinois. You will observe that his hands and feet are gone. In the opposite picture he is shown as the producer. This is a splendid example of society being relieved of a great obligation and the man becoming a self-producer and independent in the race of life:

Jack W. was a caretaker of estates on the north shore. His hands and feet became frostbitten, necessitating amputation. Hooks and artificial feet were furnished by the rehabilitation department. He had very little education. At present he is selling men's furnishings at an average wage of $20 per week.

I have one more case from my own State of Mississippi. One picture shows this man as a pitiable object and the other as a self-supporting citizen:

Physical restoration and vocational training have paid big dividends in the life of W. S., of Wilkinson County, Miss.
At the age of 6 William became a helpless cripple from infantile paralysis. From that time to the age of 27 he made his way over the ground on his hands and knees. He lived too far from the schoolhouse to attend regularly and when he was grown he had completed only the fourth grade.
The spirit of the boy remained unbroken through all the years of hardship, and he never ceased to hope that some day something would be done for him that would enable him to walk and to become an independent citizen, able to make a living for himself and his widowed mother.
William applied to the Department of Civilian Rehabilitation and was at once visited by the supervisor, who advised him to have an operation. Under the supervision of the Department of Rehabilitation, William was given four operations and spent nine months in the hospital. For the first time in 20 years William stood erect and was able to walk with crutches. He was given a course in shoe repairing and in six months completed the course and began work in a small shop for himself.
William has been at work eight years. He has enlarged his shop and fitted it with electric machinery. He has trained two crippled people for the Department of Rehabilitation.
The total cost of this case was $332.50.

I remind you of this fact, that the cost of this training is kept reasonably low. I say to you it is very meritorious and is my conception of true economy.

Now, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman's question.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLZEY. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has made a very interesting statement and has cited several illustrations or examples as to the work that has been done in rehabilitation. Does the gentleman not think that if the States themselves had done this work the same results would have been obtained?

Mr. ELLZEY. In answer to this question, I think your same argument would apply to Federal appropriations for highways and other causes. In other words, I think it is just as reasonable, if you please, to help this type of humanity, which is a burden on the Federal Government, as much as on the individual State. It is reasonable and is just as legal and legitimate as it is for the Federal Government to appropriate Federal highway funds for the States. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman answers very well with reference to the highways. Of course, the question of use in interstate commerce might enter into that, and, of course, the constitutional right to build post roads, but if the gentleman's position is correct or logical, why should not the Federal Government go farther and take care of every individual who becomes ill in this country and furnish a doctor and medicine to restore or rehabilitate him?

Mr. ELLZEY. I shall answer with a question. Would the gentleman favor a withdrawal of all national appropriations from the States?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am not sure I would favor such a step.

Mr. ELLZEY. Would not the same argument hold true of other Federal appropriations?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have some doubt as to whether this is a Federal function. I would favor the withdrawal of these particular funds. I do not believe the framers of the Constitution or the makers of the Government ever intended to have such burdens placed upon the Treasury of the Federal Government.

Mr. ELLZEY. Would the gentleman from Alabama favor the withdrawal of Federal funds for highway construction?

Mr. McDUFFIE. As I say, I do not think that is on all fours with this case at all, for the State has a great highway that enters into interstate commerce and is used as post roads.

Mr. ELLZEY. Is the State of Alabama able to build her own highways?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; but the State of Alabama is able to take care of her crippled and will do it even if this bill fails.

Mr. ELLZEY. Does the State of Alabama participate freely now in the Federal funds for vocational rehabilitation?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLZEY. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Do the exhibits the gentleman used have reference to cases coming within his personal knowledge or were they sent to him?

Mr. ELLZEY. I requested them. One case presented is from my own State, and it was my own thought to procure them.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLZEY. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. I concur in the statement of my colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] that Alabama is able to take care of her cripples, but the State did not do it until Federal aid was provided. Federal aid encouraged the people of Alabama to take an interest in it, and they are now caring for them as they never did before. I am heartily in favor of this measure.

Mr. ELLZEY. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] whether or not before Federal aid was given these unfortunate children they were a responsibility on your State?

Mr. ALMON. Certainly they were.

Mr. ELLZEY. And is it not further true that many of them now are self-sustaining?

Mr. ALMON. That is a fact. The people of Alabama are unanimously in favor of this legislation, so far as I am advised.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I have never before heard of Member of Congress on the floor of the House indict his own State as did the gentleman from Alabama. He admitted that his (their) State had a duty to perform which it neglected until the Federal Government encroached upon that State function.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not referring to me.

Mr. PALMISANO. No; I am speaking of the gentleman from Alabama who made the admission. There are other gentlemen from Alabama besides the gentleman who has just spoken.

As I stated, they have admitted that the State of Alabama had a duty to perform, and that had not the Federal Government encroached upon that duty and forced them to do something it would have neglected—what they have an obligation to do—to educate and take care of their citizens.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman will not claim this was forced on the people of Alabama. They had the right to accept Federal aid and took advantage of it.

Mr. PALMISANO. That was the gentleman's statement.

Mr. ALMON. I did not say it was forced on the people.

Mr. PALMISANO. In substance that is what the gentleman meant.

Mr. ALMON. I did not say it was forced on the people of Alabama.

Mr. PALMISANO. No; but I am correct, for in substance the gentleman said that until the Federal Government took up this function the State of Alabama refused——

Mr. ALMON. No; had neglected these cripples. Other States neglected highway construction until they got Federal aid.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest evils of the country to-day is centralization. In the last 15 or 20 years many public buildings have been built in the District of Columbia and many bureaus have been created encroaching upon State rights, and this is one of those bureaus. The Economy Committee and many Members of the House the other day voted to do away with certain Federal functions. Among other things under consideration was the consolidation of the Army and Navy, a purely Federal Government affair, but now we are asked to vote for a proposition of this kind which is really a matter for the States to take care of.

I have been fair with the people of my State; I have received many letters on this proposition from the people of my State and have replied to all who have written me. Mr. Blackburn, the head of the vocational-education system in Maryland has written to me. I replied as follows:

JANUARY 19, 1932.

Mr. J. D. BLACKWELL,
Director Department of Education,
Lexington Building, Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIR: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, in which you request my support for the rehabilitation bill No. 4743. In reply, I wish to state that I have always felt that this appropriation for civilian rehabilitation should be abated. I can not understand in these days of depression, when able-bodied men are unable to obtain employment, how rehabilitation will benefit the more unfortunate by way of obtaining positions. I therefore request you to give me a list of persons, together with their respective ages (not including veterans), who have been rehabilitated during the civilian rehabilitation act.

Very truly yours,

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

He replied to me and gave me a list of the men and boys that he had rehabilitated, and he gives me 11 in Baltimore City, running from 18 to 47. Just think of it, only 11 in the city of Baltimore from October 1, 1929, to June 30, 1931. In the 23 counties of the State he gave me 12, not 1 in each and every county. Just think of it. From October 1, 1929, until June 30, 1931, they were able to get one individual in each of 11 counties, and the cost for the 21 months has been an average of $760 for each individual. The board of education claims it cost only $221 per individual.

STATE OF MARYLAND,
DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Baltimore, January 28, 1932.

Hon. VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PALMISANO: Our delay in replying to your letter of January 19 concerning the rehabilitation program in Maryland has been due to the absence from the city of our State supervisor, Mr. R. C. Thompson. Immediately upon his return to the office to-day a list of the rehabilitated cases in our State was prepared, and it is being inclosed. We are also sending to you a copy of the Maryland School Bulletin, Volume XII, March, 1931, which explains the nature of the work we are doing and contains a summary of the rehabilitation program for the first 15 months after it was inaugurated. But $5,000 from Federal and $5,000 from State funds were available during the first year of the rehabilitation program in Maryland.

Our department feels that vocational-rehabilitation service is necessary to a well-rounded State program of education, and we further feel that the service should be jointly supported by the Federal Government and the State for reasons which have been advanced before your Committee on Education. It is our sincere hope that you will sponsor the bill now before Congress, since the benefits to be derived by the citizens of Maryland from the appropriation asked for will be far greater than we can estimate.

We shall be glad to give you any additional information that you may desire.

Very truly yours,

J. D. BLACKWELL,
Director of Vocational Education.

Our live roll on January 25, 1932, is 87 cases in Baltimore City and 126 in the counties. Of this number, at least 25 will be rehabilitated before June 30, 1932.

Furthermore, the Baltimore Association of Commerce has also written to me on this subject, the business people of Baltimore, and I replied and gave them my views. The educational board had reported favorably on this bill, but on a vote taken by the members of that association they voted against this bill.

Before this bill was passed by the members of the Education Committee I furnished the committee with some information. I knew at the time I could do nothing before that committee, and I do not expect that my views will be taken here to-day. But I am calling this to your attention, and I called it to the attention of the members of the committee, for the sole purpose of hoping that some day in the near future they will make a thorough investigation of this educational system and ascertain how many men who have been unfortunate enough to require this civilian rehabilitation have been able to obtain positions after being rehabilitated.

Gentlemen, to give you an idea of what they have in mind under this civilian rehabilitation let me say that the chairman of this board contends we are only taking care of one-tenth. A gentleman by the name of O'Grady, of New York, in 1929 came before the committee and said, "Why, you have not started this civilian rehabilitation. Bear this in mind you have not started." Now, just to inform you what he wants to do. He said, "What are you going to do with the actors in the city of New York who have lost their positions due to the introduction of the moving pictures? What are you going to do with the musicians in the country who are losing their positions due to the radio?"

Well, if you are going to take that into consideration, you will in the next two or three Congresses appropriate $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 more in order to take care of this education. I say, if it is education that is deserved—and I am not condemning it—it is an education that the States should perform. It is an insult to say to the State of Maryland and to the other States where they are spending millions and millions of dollars in education yearly that if the Federal Government does not give us the $5,000 they have been giving since October, 1929, that we would refuse to appropriate the additional $5,000 or $10,000 in order to take care of these unfortunates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me the gentleman's indictment is against the Legislature of the State of Maryland, which has by official act availed itself of the benefits of this law.

Mr. PALMISANO. No. The State of Maryland has stood by State rights.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not dispute the fact that the Legislature of the State of Maryland by statute has accepted the benefits of this act?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes. The answer to that is this, that the bureaus created here in Washington are collecting funds from the people of the State of Maryland for the purpose of taking care of this education, and unless it participates in this fund the people of the State will be paying a tax from which it will derive no benefit.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me what the State of Maryland does with the funds appropriated by the State and by the Federal Government for this work if they are not rehabilitating people?

Mr. PALMISANO. I gave you the answer of the gentleman who has charge of this educational work. He said that in 21 months they had rehabilitated 23 people, most of whom were young boys, 18 and 19 years of age, 11 in 23 counties, only one in each of 11 counties, but in 12 other counties they were unable to find an individual case for rehabilitation.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. But the gentleman's State used $10,000 more of Federal funds last year than in the year preceding, so there must be use for that work.

Mr. PALMISANO. The State of Maryland just participated in this fund in October, 1929.

Mr. ELLZEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. ELLZEY. Did the State of Maryland feel insulted or fail to accept all other Federal appropriations for that State?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know, but I will say this, that as a member of the Maryland Legislature in 1914 I, for one, always voted against any appropriation by the Federal Government whereby the Federal Government would encroach upon State rights.

I think the quicker you do it and the quicker you get the Federal Government to stop encroaching upon State affairs, the better it will be and the sooner the expenditures of the Government will be reduced to the point where they ought to be.

Mr. ELLZEY. Then, the gentleman's attitude is that the State of Maryland should not accept any money by way of Federal-aid appropriations?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is my position, and that applies also to roads. So far as the roads are concerned, unless the Federal Government regulates interstate commerce in reference to trucks and such transportation that makes use of State roads, the States should not participate in Federal aid of roads.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. From the hearings that have been held before the gentleman's committee, I notice there are about 25,000 men and women who are being rehabilitated throughout the United States.

Mr. PALMISANO. According to the educators of the country; yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. There has been appropriated the sum of $1,000,000 from the Government of the United States toward the rehabilitation of these 25,000 people every year.

Mr. PALMISANO. Twelve million dollars, or $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. SIROVICH. Therefore if you divide the 25,000 people who are receiving the benefit of this rehabilitation work into the sum of $1,000,000, that means that each person is receiving $40 a year as the amount being spent for rehabilitation; and if the State contributes an equal amount, it means that both the State and the Federal Government are spending $80 a year to take care of each one of these persons for rehabilitation purposes.

I wish to state that the pamphlet sent out by John J. Lee, legislative committeeman of the National Rehabilitation Association, contradicts itself regarding the costs per capita for rehabilitation. For instance, he states on page 4 of his pamphlet the costs to be $291 per case and on page 2 the number of persons rehabilitated in 1930 to be 4,589 and in 1931, 5,192, and the money appropriated by the Federal and State Governments in 1930 to be $1,690,344.01, which makes the approximate cost $370, and in 1931 the appropriation by the State and Federal Governments was $2,019,651.74, which shows the per capita cost to be $388. So you will note that after 10 years' experience the per capita cost begins to increase instead of decreasing.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Education, it is my purpose to speak in favor of this bill, known as H. R. 4743, the vocational rehabilitation bill. This bill provides for the continuation of the work which was started in 1920 in pursuance to "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment." There is one thought I would like to bring to your mind, namely, that the bill should be enacted into law not on the theory of economy but from a humanitarian viewpoint.

In my State of New York we have acquired leadership in helping the handicapped and disabled. Our workman's compensation law, our widow's pension law, and our other social welfare laws are as good as, if not better than, those of any other State in the Union. When these laws were passed our legislators always took into consideration in their passage that they were not problems of economy but that they were problems involving human welfare. Likewise, I appeal to you to-day to pass this bill, giving emphasis to its humanitarian aspects and not simply regarding it as another economy measure. In my State we have made wonderful strides in this welfare and humanitarian direction. The splendid results of our rehabilitation work justify the enthusiastic support of this bill by the entire delegation from New York.

If this bill becomes a law, we are not only helping the handicapped man but we are benefiting his family. We all know the disappointment and sorrow that comes to a home when one of its members is rendered disabled by disease or accident. If by the appropriations of this bill States can render help to such disabled victims, benefit not only accrues to these individuals but also to their families, to their communities, and to the Nation at large.

I hope this bill will pass unanimously, and in its passage I hope that you will be actuated by a desire to help a disabled citizen to become once more self-supporting rather than by a notion of promoting economy. I would like the RECORD to show that it is the intention and spirit of the House that we are enacting this legislation to help these disabled men in their return to civil employment and that we are not passing merely another economy measure.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask a question about the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the bill enlarge upon the act which is expiring or does the bill propose to add anything to the provisions of the old law?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be delighted to permit the chairman of the committee to answer the question.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. No; this bill essentially continues the old law at the same appropriation with the same allowance of $97,000 to take care of the minimum allowance. There is no increase. The original bill did ask for an increase of $500,000 and the committee rejected that and reported the bill carrying an extension of four years on the old basis.

Mr. McDUFFIE. So far as the conditions precedent are concerned before the receipt of help from the Federal Treasury, there is no change in the bill?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. This bill is really a continuation of the present act with the same appropriation and everything. It is not a permanent act but continues the work for four years with the same appropriation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. To what extent does the disability have to exist before one may have the benefit of this legislation?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is determined by the State authority, upon examination, subject to the approval of the Federal Government.

Mr. KENNEDY. There has been some opposition offered to the bill on the ground that it is unconstitutional. These objections have been met by many decisions of the Supreme Court involving similar propositions, and I submit the following cases for your attention: Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1, 199); United States v. Realty Co. (163 U. S. 427, 440); United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Co. (160 U. S. 668, 681); Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649, 695).

Of all the money appropriated by the Federal Government to the States there is none spent that brings greater returns to the individuals, to the community, and the State than the money that has been spent in vocational rehabilitation and vocational guidance.

There is nothing more tragic than men, women, and children who have been stricken with disease or stricken down by accident, and who, as a result thereof, are partially or wholly physically handicapped. Because of these disabilities they can not find a place where their services are needed, so they have staring them in the face the humiliation of being objects of charity, which is naturally dreaded, knowing that they are doomed to an existence that will be on the border line of perpetual poverty. For years this was the lot of such physically handicapped men, women, and children, as well as boys and girls of working age. They were literally thrown upon the human junk heap.

The American Federation of Labor, composed of millions of working men and women in every part of the 48 States of our Union, know of the despair of these working men and women. They come in contact with them daily. The story of despair and dread of the future is heart-rending. A quarter of a century ago they advocated vocational rehabilitation for all physically handicapped persons.

They now maintain that vocational rehabilitation is just as necessary as workmen's compensation. Vocational rehabilitation and vocational guidance start where compensation leaves off. For 12 years we have had this law, and the services it has rendered not only to unfortunate civilians but to our disabled veterans as well have been notable in their successes.

It has brought hope into the hearts of our physically handicapped, and the blessings of this legislation are immeasurable.

The record made of placing these rehabilitated workers in employment in 1931 deserves the greatest commendation. They placed more than 6,000 people back in industry. In addition to this they trained and have ready for placement approximately 2,500 more. That there is a very definite need for this service to be continued and that there is a great appreciation of the service already rendered are evidenced by the fact that in the 27 States the rehabilitation appropriations have been increased over those of the preceding biennium; 11 States continued their usual appropriation.

And now, with respect to adequate appropriations, I place it in the hands of the House to decide whether or not we will carry on in terms of social need to completion.

I want to call attention to the fact that this is the only service which is established to train and place handicapped people in employment. That is an absolute fact from the standpoint of any organized program covering other than very local situations.

We appropriate large sums of money for material rehabilitation. Certainly, it would seem that when the welfare of at least 75,000 people depends upon the rehabilitation of citizens, the request I make for a million dollars is the least that a Federal Government could do as its share. And I say that knowing that the States are in a position to meet their share of the responsibility from their own standpoint.

Finally, it appeals to me to indicate the effect so far as the psychology of the handicapped person is concerned when it comes to rehabilitation. I would have you note the philosophy of life which a crippled person follows. The creed of the cripple is this:

> Once more to be useful. To see pity in the eyes of my friends replaced by commendation. To work, to produce, to provide; seeking no favors and giving none; a man among men in spite of my physical handicap.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I appreciate the attention you have given me during my talk on this important measure. I hope that when the roll is called all the Members will join with me in my effort to secure the passage of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is a great pleasure for me, as a member of the Committee on Education, to lend my whole-hearted support to this measure.

The first time I ever came in contact with rehabilitation work was late in the fall of 1917 in France. I was invited by a dear old professor to go out to an ancient agricultural university to see what they were doing for crippled soldiers. There I found at this university hundreds and hundreds of crippled men being taught a suitable vocation so that they might go back to their own communities and become self-supporting.

The legless and armless and blind were there. They had invited blind men and cripples to the university and were having them talk with these men, assuring them that they could still be happy and useful and telling them how they could be trained and again face the world and enjoy life.

Soon after I entered Congress, the rehabilitation bill was enacted. Since that time 50,000 hopeless, discouraged cripples have been placed in gainful occupations. The average wage of these 50,000 persons since their rehabilitation has been about $27 a week. Based upon their life expectancy, these people will earn approximately $2,200,000,000. So much for the economic side.

The question has been raised why the States should not look out for their own. I know of nothing more sad, except death, than to have a loved one crippled and forced to face the world hopelessly handicapped. I want to say to you that there were some States prior to this legislation that failed in their responsibility to those crippled in industry. As a result of this act, which we now seek to continue, 44 States are now participating in this very humane work.

Let us see what the effect would be if you were to destroy this act. Some of the States would continue it. My State would continue it, and so would the great States of New Jersey, Illinois, Michigan, and many Western States, but there are some States that would ignore this work.

What would happen if those States should fail, as they did prior to the enactment of this legislation? It would mean that every family that had a crippled member would sacrifice every dollar, every local attachment, to move to a State that was carrying on the work. You would have the crippled coming from those States that failed to train them to the States where they could be trained and placed in a gainful occupation. It is far better for the cripple to have the work done in his own home atmosphere, in his own community, where he would have the sympathy of his own people.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. BALDRIGE. What is the difference between this vocational education and the other vocational education act?

Mr. REED of New York. This relates to vocational education of those who are crippled and unable to gain a livelihood, to teach them some trade to carry on. The other has nothing to do with this, but they cooperate where they can.

Mr. BALDRIGE. How much of this million dollars goes for the administration expense?

Mr. REED of New York. About $80,000. Some question has been raised about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. REED of New York. Since the World War more has been learned about taking care of cripples than ever before in the history of the world. That information has been obtained, not only in this country, but from abroad; it has been brought into one central spot where, through the Board for Vocational Education, it has been made available to all of the States. Every State can utilize the information with the result that people who are supposed to be hopelessly and forever classed as cripples and unable to earn a livelihood, now have facilities available so that they may be trained and placed in a gainful occupation. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a man or woman in this House who is not in favor of the rehabilitation of people who are disabled in industry. The question is, however, as to whether it is a duty that properly belongs to the Federal Government. I have repeatedly upon this floor opposed measures which provided for Federal aid. I have stated that it is my opinion that the Federal Government should take care of its rivers and harbors, that the Federal Government very properly provides for Federal aid to the States in connection with roads, but that aside from that, unless it be an emergency, it is my opinion it is the duty of the States and not the Federal Government to take care of the people within the boundaries of the States. That statement applies to people who are injured in industry. Who is not in favor of helping a poor individual who suffers some disability by reason of an accident while employed in industry? Why, of course, all favor helping those injured. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has just told us that 44 States in the Union have taken advantage of this law. I venture the opinion that out of those 44 States there are 20 among them that are to-day taking from the Federal Treasury in the way of Federal aid more money than they actually pay into the Treasury of the United States. The Congress of the United States has run wild upon the subject of Federal aid. During the hearings on the economy bill, the attention of the committee was called to the fact that we have six or seven hundred agricultural experiment stations in this country. The Secretary of Agriculture sat with the committee and said to give them to the States, that they are duplicating the work of the States and that if the States do not want them, to close them up. The Secretary of Agriculture made that suggestion. We have in this country over 6,000 extension agents in connection with agriculture, part of their pay paid by the Federal Government. There are only a few over 4,000 counties in the country, and we have one county or extension agent for each county and then 2,000 besides. A map was laid out before the committee, and in some counties in South Carolina, where I happen to have been myself, and where I could not see a chicken or a hog or cattle of any kind, there were as many as seven county agents, the Federal Government paying its portion of their salaries.

I am willing to stand whatever tax the State of Missouri may place on me to take care of people who are injured in industry and try to teach them some vocation whereby they might make a living, but I do oppose this continuation of Federal aid which is simply nothing more than taking money from the pockets of the people of the States, money in the form of taxes, and letting the money be handled here in Washington and in part turned back to the States. [Applause.]

The President of the United States recommended to the Economy Committee that it might be advisable to discontinue agriculture vocational education for one year. He was willing that the Government should continue to rehabilitate those injured in industry. It became known that the Economy Committee was considering the suggestion and I venture the assertion, without fear of contradiction, that there never was such a storm of protest from the four corners of the United States as that received in opposition. The opposition, in my opinion, was justified to a certain extent. The law had been on the statute books for a number of years, placed there to stimulate action by the States in this direction. To stop the aid overnight, without any notice to the States, would have been unfair. As legislatures of the various States did not meet until next year there would have been no way for the States to have provided for the necessary appropriation. The schools would be closed. To me it appears that it is just as much the duty of the States to teach agriculture in the rural sections as it is to teach grammar in the city schools.

When the Economy Committee brought in the bill to cut the appropriations made by the Federal Government gradually year by year, so as to give the States an opportunity to adjust themselves to the situation, the House disapproved and struck the section from the bill.

If you will give the States fair notice that you are going to discontinue this aid after a certain period there will not be a State in the Union now teaching vocational education that will not provide by State funds for its continuance. I say it should be continued, but by the States, and again I say that I am willing to stand any tax that my State places upon me to see that it is continued.

The principle of Federal aid is unsound, unless it be an emergency. I can not subscribe to it, although I know, as my friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] told me several years ago, my view is an unpopular one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE].

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I find myself this afternoon in a rather unfortunate or an unhappy position, driven to it, if you please, by my own convictions, whether those convictions are right or wrong. I am in an unhappy and almost embarrassing position from several points of view. First, this bill is sponsored by my warm friend, for whom I have a most affectionate regard, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Alabamians and others all about me differ with me as to the position I shall assume on this measure. I hope no one feels I am assuming to be a profound constitutional lawyer or that my judgment is superior to that of Mr. BANKHEAD or any member of the Committee on Education, or this committee, on this subject. Certainly I have no personal feelings in the matter, and I am sure that they have none at all. I am sure they accord me the right to express my opinion in respect to this important bill. In this forum we are all supposed to express our opinion in matters of this kind whenever the opportunity is afforded, and one feels impelled to do so.

I regret that I can not agree, first, that this is one of the constitutional functions of the Government. We build post roads, of course, under the Constitution, and we develop rivers and harbors, and we do many things under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, but it occurs to me that if this be a proper function of the Federal Government it is also a proper function of the Federal Government to send for a doctor for every citizen when he is sick or to provide him with an artificial limb if one of his limbs happens to be amputated. There is no escape from that conclusion. Follow the reasoning of this bill and you can not escape the logic of that conclusion. How far should our judgment go in legislation of this character? That is the question.

As the gentleman from Missouri said, Where is the man—he is not in this hall of course, or in this country, I am sure—who would not give all the funds he could spare from his own exchequer to take care of the halt, the lame, and the blind, and all unfortunates? Where is the State which has not now an institution or agencies of its own for that purpose? I want some gentleman to rise in his place and name one. Civic clubs, charitable institutions are now functioning in every State aside from State activities furnished by the taxpayers of those States. To hear some of these gentlemen, one would think our States have all failed in this great social problem. I deny it, and I deny that the failure of this measure will stop the fine work of this kind now carried on by the States.

Is it contended that if the Federal Government does not contribute to the State of Alabama $25,000 the State of Alabama will neglect her unfortunates, her halt, her lame, and her blind? How many industries are carrying insurance to take care of those hurt in accidents? Practically all of them. Oh, we want to relieve all people disabled from the human scrap heap, and take them from the status of the "living dead," as some clever witness said before your committee. Everybody wishes to do that, but the question is: "Is this a proper function of the Federal Government?" Who is urging the measure? I can not but be moved by the fine impulses and the good judgment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the members of this committee, on which there is another distinguished Alabaman [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would rather finish my statement, please. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] knows how greatly I respect his judgment. We differ, it so happens, on this particular proposition. If we look over the hearings, we find that those who have urged this legislation, other than the sponsor of the bill, are 90 per cent, I venture to say—and if I am incorrect, I want the chairman to correct me—those who are already drawing some kind of salary from the Government or some local government engaged in this or similar work. Characteristic of all bureaus, this one is clamoring for more and more authority and more and more expansion. This, gentlemen, in my opinion, is one more step, if you please, to that day when Congress will be called upon to create a new department, a department of education, with its head a member of the Cabinet. One step nearer that day when some bureau in Washington will dictate to you in Arkansas or you in New York or Massachusetts or Tennessee as to how your child shall be educated, under what conditions that child shall be educated, what schoolhouse he shall sit in, and the hours of his attendance. Remember, gentlemen, the Federal Government always lays its hand where it puts its money, and properly so. It dictates the expenditure of these funds. The people by taxes raise the funds.

Let me pause here to deny even any intimation that the State of Alabama will refuse or neglect to take care of its halt and its lame or to perform its social duty, because the Federal Government does not give to that great sovereign State the paltry sum of $25,000. [Applause.] Such an indictment can not be made in my presence without protest.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would prefer to finish. I am sorry.

We talk about economies in the Federal Government. Economy! Here is an extra charge upon the Federal Government of $4,000,000. This act has been in operation since 1920, and the Federal Government has expended about $14,000,000, all told, caring for a very small percentage of our cripples. This work is plainly the duty of the States, and most of it is done by the States. Have the States failed in this responsibility? No. They are already engaged in this work, and, of course, the States will continue it.

Some gentleman asked, "Would not your State accept it?" I answer with the question, Where did you ever see a State that would not accept it? Only 4 of the 48 have not accepted this small aid. "Here is something coming from the Federal Treasury," the legislator says. "It comes easy. Let us match it." It is not often that consideration is given to how money gets into the Federal Treasury. They match it, of course, and will continue to do so. For 12 years this act has been in effect. You have a roll to-day of 23,000 people aided and eligible for employment. Do you mean to tell me those 23,000 people would have had no attention from the local governments simply because Uncle Sam had not extended his strong right arm? It is all well enough to talk about crippled humanity. God knows my heart and your heart goes out to anyone who is suffering from a handicap. The question is, after all, Is this the function of the Federal Government? I do not believe, by any logical reasoning, any man can bring his mind to the conclusion that it is the duty of the Federal Government to further carry on this work. There are no limitations if this is a function of the Federal Government. No one knows where Congress will stop, nor what the future may bring forth to our form of government.

Incidentally let me call to your attention the fact that there are very few taxpayers who appeared here in support of this bill. Only about a dozen employers appeared or approved it by letter, and, as I said, the rest of the indorsers were those serving with some kind of an organization similar to this bureau, and they may be classed as propagandists. It is fair to assume that most of them are drawing some kind of pay from somebody. Most of those indorsing this bill belong to a nation-wide organization, ready at all times to propagandize this Congress to enlarge its activities or appropriations, demanding, if you please, more bureaucratic power and more money from the Federal Treasury.

There is a vast deal of difference between this proposal and the building of post roads. There is a vast deal of difference between this kind of an appropriation and an appropriation that comes from the Federal Government for rivers and harbors. This question has never been settled by our Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court said in the case of the maternity act, if I am not mistaken, that the State did not have to take these funds, and on some ground of that kind dismissed the case. The constitutionality of this sort of legislation, as I understand it, has not been passed on by our courts.

When are we going to stop the hand of Uncle Sam or the Federal Government from mixing into the private affairs of the people of this Nation?

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not right now, if you please.

We created a bureau to teach women how to bring children into this world and care for them, and now another bill is introduced proposing to teach them how to avoid it. Where are we going to stop? There is a bill now for birth control before this Congress. To what extent is the Federal Government going? Let me read to you what Thomas Jefferson said, if I may, in that regard:

> It is not by consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution that good Government is effected. Were not this country already divided into States, that distribution must be made, that each might have the benefit of what concerns himself directly, and what it can so much better do than an outside authority. Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap we should soon want bread.

Have we not almost reached that point in our progress? Oh, gentlemen, it is not here a question of cripples but a question of the perpetuity of this Nation and its form of government, which we would all preserve for our children's children.

We are being directed from Washington to-day when to sow, what to sow, what the weather will be, what the harvest will be, and how to reap the harvest.

Jefferson continued, and we should listen to his wise advice to-day:

> It is by this partition of care descending in gradation from general to particular that the mass of human affairs may be best managed for the good and prosperity of all.

Mr. Chairman, I do not contend this work is not necessary. I do not contend against the view of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who will tell you this appropriation is the best-invested money this Government ever expended. I do not deny that. The question is, if you please, a fundamental, basic question. When will you stop extending the hand of Uncle Sam into the affairs of the States and localities and stop assuming the responsibilities of the citizen? Such a policy breaks down individual initiative and enterprise. It destroys that spirit which was in your father and mine, who, when stricken down under panics and distressed economic conditions, half-soled their shoes, patched their trousers, carried on, and climbed up again. To-day the first thought is to turn to Uncle Sam for help and sustenance.

How long, Mr. Chairman, must we continue; how long can this Government be perpetuated, if you please, if we are to continue to make the Federal Government the wet nurse of all the citizens of this Republic? [Applause.]

It is time for us to stop and think. I know I am on the unpopular side of this question. I know my own colleagues differ with me. They have been most gracious and kind to me; they know I am sincere in this matter. In an humble way, and in a respectful way, I again submit to the committee and to my colleagues from Alabama that the time has come when we can at least eliminate this activity which for 12 years has gone on and in which the States themselves now have been thoroughly educated. In this time of stress and strain we can well afford to do without adding $4,000,000 more to the cost of the Federal Government. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin, my friend Mr. STAFFORD, who gave me this time. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman said with reference to those who had indorsed this legislation that 90 per cent of them were job holders.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I said I might be mistaken in that. I said there were about a dozen employers, and looking over the list one would naturally infer that most of the indorsers were those who are on some sort of pay roll now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire whether the gentleman used 15 minutes or whether I have any more time at my disposal?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has four minutes left.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will yield me two minutes, I shall be glad to answer the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman as much of the four minutes as he desires.

Mr. KVALE. I want to make the observation that in a statement I introduced six indorsements from Minnesota citizens into the RECORD. One was from the governor. The next was from the secretary of the State federation of labor. The next was from the chairman of the Minnesota Committee on Social Legislation. The next was from the secretary-treasurer of the Association for Crippled Children. The next was from the executive secretary of the Minnesota Public Health Association. None of them is a Federal job holder. I think these job holders, though, are among the most consecrated of public servants.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not doubt that.

Mr. KVALE. None of these is a Federal job holder, and they undoubtedly are indorsing the bill because they believe it is of some value and will be satisfactory. They are supporting it on its merits, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McDUFFIE. There should be no limit in helping crippled people; nobody doubts that. Probably in the gentleman's State they feel it is the province of the Federal Government to do it, and to go even further than this.

The gentleman is entitled to his opinion. I am not differing with him in a personal way. I am simply trying to state my own view as to the powers of the Government and the propriety of the Government continuing in this kind of activity; it matters not how humane and appealing the work may be.

Mr. KVALE. I only want to add that I think the author of the measure will attempt to demonstrate that it is not only the financial assistance, but it is the guiding, directing, and coordinating work which the Federal Government does that is of such great value.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And that takes a great deal of this fund, I fear.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman made a bitter attack upon the Federal Government as being a wet nurse for the States and sends out a clarion call. Would the gentleman be willing to rally his colleagues from Alabama in preventing the Federal Government from continuing to be a dry nurse and telling the people what they should drink?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think the gentleman is facetious in that question.

Mr. ELLZEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. ELLZEY. Does the gentleman favor the withdrawal of help by the Federal Government for the disabled veterans of the World War?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No.

Mr. ELLZEY. Is not the gentleman inconsistent?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. ELLZEY. Did the gentleman vote for the $2,000,000,000 appropriation to aid State banks in the various States?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I did not, I am glad to inform the gentleman.

Mr. ELLZEY. I was misinformed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman was misinformed.

Mr. BEAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. BEAM. Is it not a fact that in practically every State of the Union the workmen's compensation law is in effect, and one of the sponsors of the measure stated that such a great number, and probably a majority, of the men injured and seeking this rehabilitating training were railroad men injured in interstate commerce?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not know; but that may have been stated.

Mr. BEAM. Therefore, does not the gentleman feel that is an obligation which the Government ought to assume?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am not ready to agree that the Government should continue in this activity. If we continue in this work, the field is wide open. We may look for State medicine and a department of education. If these come, what next?

Now, gentlemen, I suggest that you find out how many people this great bureau has really rehabilitated. You can not put a value on a human life; I know that; but I suggest that you find out what each State gets under this authorization and then determine for yourselves whether it is proper for the Federal Government to continue this fund and this Federal bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am always delighted to hear the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE] speak on any subject, and usually I agree with him. I have listened with unusual interest to the very forceful argument made by him to-day. Let me say that I agree with many of the principles enunciated by the gentleman. I am a firm believer in State rights. I agree further that the Federal Government has gradually encroached upon the rights of the States until we have become a strongly centralized Government.

I am unable, however, to agree that those great democratic and fundamental principles of Government have any place in this argument. If the gentleman is so fundamentally opposed to the Federal Government participating in matters of this kind, it just occurs to me that he has raised the issue several years too late. As he very well knows, the pending measure is not a new proposal but merely would make the regular appropriation as has been made in years past; and although I have searched the record, I have not found where my distinguished and beloved friend, whose only objection to the bill is his feeling that this is not a function of the Federal Government, has in the past raised any serious protest against these annual appropriations.

Both the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] have stressed the point that it is the function of the Federal Government to appropriate money from the Treasury to take care of flood control as well as for rivers and harbors. To this policy we all agree, and yet it is significant that both gentlemen live on the banks of the great Mississippi. For my part I would much prefer to cut the appropriation for rivers and harbors, flood control, roads, and highways, or delay the building of some of these monuments of brick and stone in the city of Washington than to eliminate Federal funds for the rehabilitation of the crippled throughout the land who are unable to help themselves. [Applause.]

Let me say that I agree with what the gentleman from Alabama had to say concerning the necessity for this Congress economizing and drastically cutting appropriations. I voted with the gentleman on his House economy bill, as well as on many other measures to cut governmental expenses, but I can not find it in my heart to turn my back on the helpless and crippled humanity who will benefit so materially by this legislation.

During the hearings on this bill I appeared before the Committee on Education and urged favorable consideration of the measure. I call your attention to the fact that the committee has already cut the appropriation more than $500,000 below the amount asked for.

My interest in this legislation dates back several years. As I recall, the vocational rehabilitation bill was originally passed by Congress in June, 1920, but Oklahoma did not accept the act until 1925. I was a member of the Oklahoma State Senate at that time and chairman of the committee on education of that body. I wrote the acceptance act for Oklahoma, introduced it in the State senate, and was vigorous and enthusiastic in my efforts to put it through the legislature that year.

I am glad to say the Oklahoma Legislature passed the acceptance act in the year 1925, and has more than matched the Federal aid, so I am advised, every year since that time.

As the gentleman from Alabama referred to my State of Oklahoma, let me say that since the passage of the acceptance act more than 500 disabled persons in our State have been rehabilitated and placed on jobs representing some 70 different vocations. This has enabled some 500 disabled citizens of Oklahoma to earn an honest living, and I am reliably informed that they now earn annually an average of more than twice the amount it cost to train them. It has taken these cripples off of the streets and made breadearners of them.

I am advised by the state superintendent of education that the cost of training these 500 disabled people has averaged about $450 per person; that after such training the average individual earnings have been over $1,000 annually. I seriously doubt if any piece of national legislation passed in the last quarter of a century has brought greater returns and done more to alleviate unemployment to any class than has the vocational rehabilitation bill for the unfortunate, disabled people, not only in my State but throughout the entire country. It may be surprising to some when I say further I am officially advised that more than 48,000 such citizens have been trained under the rehabilitation act, and that some 24,000 people in the United States are now in training.

I am supporting the pending bill for the reason that I fear Oklahoma can not adequately carry on this splendid program without Federal aid, and I assume the same situation is true in many other States despite repeated statements to the contrary by the gentleman from Alabama. I said a moment ago that Oklahoma had more than matched Federal aid for this purpose. Our State now exceeds the Federal allotment by nearly $7,000 per annum. The Federal allotment for Oklahoma last year was $19,340, and the State appropriated and spent $25,000 for the same year.

Not only has the State of Oklahoma more than 500 disabled in training, but right now I am reliably informed that my State alone has a waiting list of 750 deserving people who are eligible and pleading for an opportunity for self-improvement as contemplated under this act. Let us bear in mind that these unfortunates have been disabled through no fault of their own, but through disease, accident, birth, and war. Practically all of them can be, and as fast as possible are being, made assets rather than liabilities on society. If rehabilitated, they can be made earners, thereby becoming worthwhile citizens in every sense of the word, instead of being charges upon friends, relatives, and charitable institutions. It would be almost a tragedy to abandon this great work now, but it must be unless aid is continued on the part of the Federal Government.

In face of the fact that Congress has been overgenerous in its attitude toward foreign governments, has protected private bonds of international bankers, has financed and underwritten the powerful banking institutions and big railroads "in order to allay the fear of so-called big business," so we were told, I submit in all seriousness that it can not consistently turn a deaf ear to the thousands of unfortunate but deserving people who are looking to this Congress for relief that can not be obtained from any other source.

In closing let me say that when this bill was before the committee I received a letter from Hon. John Vaughan, State superintendent of public instruction of Oklahoma, together with some statistics relative to the work done in Oklahoma in connection with rehabilitation since the act was adopted in the year 1925. I believe this information will be of especial interest to many teachers and others who have written me in connection with the Bankhead bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the statement by Hon. John Vaughan, superintendent of public instruction and director of vocational education in Oklahoma.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
Oklahoma City, January 27, 1932.

Hon. JED JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: House Resolution No. 4743, by Mr. BANKHEAD, dealing with civilian rehabilitation has been presented to the Committee on Education.

For your information I am inclosing an accumulative record of rehabilitation in Oklahoma since the act was accepted in 1925. I know of no type of service that has yielded larger returns than the rehabilitation work in Oklahoma. The report will show how effectively this work has given training and employment to a number of people who otherwise would have been dependents on their family or society.

I appreciate your interest in this matter, because I remember how effectively you worked for the cause of rehabilitation when you were in the Oklahoma State Senate.

Respectfully,

JOHN VAUGHAN, State Superintendent.

Summarized statistical and financial report of rehabilitation service in Oklahoma from July 1, 1925, to June 30, 1931, showing case load, number of cases in training, number cases rehabilitated, average per capita cost of training, average annual income of each person rehabilitated, and total amounts expended for the 6-year period ending June 30, 1931

Year	Eligible cases	Cases in training	Cases rehabilitated [1]	Total expended from all funds
1925–26	236	33	8	$13,848.09
1926–27	445	292	18	23,690.71
1927–28	718	381	59	38,963.99
1928–29	867	296	78	34,258.07
1929–30	874	410	110	42,959.28
1930–31	840	453	181	52,309.42
				206,029.56

[1]Average per capita cost of rehabilitated cases: Only an average of $453.85 per capita for completed cases. These were at end of year 453 cases in training upon whom several thousand dollars have been spent. Average annual per capita income: Over $1,000 per year after training.

This year (1931–32) Oklahoma has 560 persons in training and 750 determined as eligible.

Respectfully,

JOHN VAUGHAN,
Director Vocational Education.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished author of the bill [Mr. BANKHEAD]. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have, of course, listened with a great deal of interest and admiration to the speeches that have been made against the pending proposal, based upon the proposition that legislation of this character is an invasion of the rights of Congress to legislate upon matters which should be essentially performed by the people of the States themselves.

It is not my purpose in undertaking to close this debate to engage in any character of controversy—though I shall make brief answer to some of the suggestions that have been made—that will tend to get this situation into a technical attitude. Of course, I respect the high order of courage and fine clarity of statement made in opposition to this bill by my colleague from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE]. It is merely one of those questions of legislation that come up in the Halls of Congress upon which men, even though they are closely and affectionately associated, sometimes differ.

If I may be pardoned for a moment, gentlemen, I want to give you very briefly the study that first interested me as the original author and sponsor of this bill in 1918 and the justification for the Federal Government undertaking to do something for that vast multitude of citizens of America who have become broken, maimed, hopeless, and disabled. In the first instance, there was the humanitarian appeal involved in it. I first began the study of this question when I was on the Committee on Education and that committee was preparing the bill for the rehabilitation of our disabled American soldiers.

I was absolutely astounded and amazed to learn in an investigation of this sociological problem that at that time no State in this Union, if I remember correctly, had ever undertaken by State action to set up a system for the rehabilitation of the maimed citizens of the respective States.

I realize there is probably a legitimate field, a legitimate deadline, if I may call it that, beyond which under a proper construction of the Federal Constitution, Congress ought not to go by way of interference with the local affairs of the people of the States; but in these investigations, when I saw the thousands and tens of thousands of people in this country maimed in industry, on the farms, on the railroads, in the quarries, and in the workshops, citizens of America, for whom no intelligent thought had ever given opportunity through the States themselves or the Federal Government, or any combination of both, to undertake to rebuild these men and women, undertaking to rehabilitate them in some character of employment by which they could again become useful citizens of this Republic and be taken off the human scrap heap, it occurred to me, from a broad, national aspect, although we might differ as to these academic constructions of the Constitution, out there in front of me, as I saw it, and in front of the Committee on Education, where my friend here then served, as I thought the enlightened public sentiment of this country would see it, surely, there was some legitimate field of operation for the Federal Government to undertake the rôle of stimulation and leadership on this question involving this multitude of our people.

This was the thought behind this bill. This was the thought behind the Committee on Education that first reported it, and it was passed by practically a unanimous vote of both branches of the Congress and has now been in operation for 10 years.

I would not be here asking for this bill to extend the authorizations for the appropriation of $1,000,000 a year for four years longer unless I was convinced, after an intelligent study of the facts under its present operation, that the legislation itself is thoroughly justified.

The appeal for the continuation of this authorization, I want to say in all candor to my friend from Alabama, does not come from those who are specifically interested as salary holders under this proposition.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman if he can inform the House how much of this money goes to pay salaries? Of the $25,000 going to Alabama, for instance, how much of it goes for salaries?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could not answer that question offhand. It has all appeared in the hearings before the committee. But be that as it may, even if some substantial portion of the appropriation is paid by way of salary to the administrators and to the vocational teachers, and that is added to the amount that would remain for the establishment of vocational facilities, if the expenditure, however it may be made, operates to the ultimate advantage of American society and to the rebuilding of our people, under the provisions of this bill, I do not think we ought to quibble about the division of the expenditure, I will say very candidly to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to suggest that it is reliably stated here that of the $1,000,000 appropriated, only $80,000, or less than 10 per cent goes for salaries.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no doubt that is approximately a correct statement.

Here is the proposition and it is not an involved one. Of course, I can understand the mental attitude of those gentlemen, and they have expressed their views upon the floor this afternoon about the extent the Federal Government should go, but we are not embarking here upon any new enterprise.

We are not exploiting any new field of Federal activity with respect to our people, but we are coming here and asking the Congress, in view of the demonstrated value of this small expenditure over a period of 10 years, to simply reauthorize this appropriation for four years longer at the same amount carried in the law, without the addition of a single dollar. We are not asking for any new interpretation of the powers of these vocational boards. We are simply resting this upon the merits of the record established by a period of 10 years of experimentation as to the value of this law and the use of this money, and I want to repeat the quotation made by my friend from Alabama, that in my deliberate opinion, looking at it from the standpoint of real benefit to those who most need it in this country, this appropriation for rehabilitation of industrial cripples is the best money paid out of the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

I do not want to submit any further argument upon the facts in this case. You will pardon me for a personal reference. I am afraid there is some impropriety in it, and yet I feel justified in making it.

There may be a little sentiment in this, but in the long run sentiment is a pretty good thing to help us keep going in this old, unhappy world of ours. I have been in Congress nearly 16 years. I have tried to do my duty here as I have seen it from day to day upon these questions of economic and fiscal policy and expenditure and programs and legislation, and sometimes in meditating with myself I try to find something I have really done of value to humanity and to my country in this rather long stretch of service. As I look back upon my service and view the efforts I have made—and you have made the same sort of effort here—I have tried to analyze the sum total of this service; and when I close my eyes, as it were, and look out there and see the more than 50,000 American citizens, crippled and maimed and disheartened and discouraged, who under the beneficent provisions and operation of this bill have been placed back in gainful employment in a self-respecting way, earning livlihood, taken off the human scrap heap and placed in positions where the great industrialists themselves have testified before the committee that they made more valuable employees than men in normal physical condition—when I review this picture I feel that at least there is some little compensation in the fact that while I may have failed in most of the other things I have undertaken to do here, I have had the honor of sponsoring a humanitarian proposition that I believe has resulted in real benefit and happiness and economic value to the people of America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment," approved June 2, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 31 and 32), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That in order to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their placement in employment, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the States, subject to the provisions of this act, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and annually thereafter, the sum of $1,500,000. Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their populations bear to the total population in the United States, not including Territories, outlying possessions, and the District of Columbia, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotments of funds to any State shall not be less than a minimum of $10,000 for any fiscal year: Provided further, That such portions of the sums allotted that will not be used in any fiscal year may be allotted in that year proportionately to the States which are prepared through available State funds to use the additional Federal funds. And there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually for each fiscal year the sum of $65,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, which shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotments to the States provided for in this section.

"All money expended under the provisions of this act from appropriations authorized by section 1 shall be upon the condition (1) that for each dollar of Federal money expended there shall be expended in the State under the supervision and control of the State board at least an equal amount for the same purpose: Provided, That no portion of the appropriations authorized by this act shall be used by any institution for handicapped persons except for vocational rehabilitation of such individuals entitled to the benefits of this act as shall be determined by the Federal board; (2) that the State board shall annually submit to the Federal board for approval plans showing (a) the plan of administration and supervision of the work; (b) the qualifications of directors, supervisors, and other employees; and (c) the policies and methods of carrying on the work; (3) that the State board shall make an annual report to the Federal board on or before September 1 of each year on the work done in the State and on the receipts and expenditures of money under the provisions of this act; (4) that no portion of any money authorized to be appropriated by this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, preservation, erection, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of any lands; (5) that all vocational rehabilitation service given under the supervision and control of the State board shall be available, under such rules and regulations as the Federal board shall prescribe, to any civil employee of the United States disabled while in the performance of his duty."

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "ending," strike out down through "$1,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "June 30, 1934, the sum of $1,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the sum of $1,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, the sum of $1,000,000; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, the sum of $1,000,000."

Page 2, line 18, after the word "appropriated," strike out down through "$65,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1934, June 30, 1935, June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, the sum of $97,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, as amended, line 7, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$900,000." Line 8, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$800,000." Line 9, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$700,000." Line 10, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$600,000."

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment, that the committee amendments have already been adopted.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of offering this amendment is to present to the House a question that may go a little further than this particular bill.

For the purpose of this discussion I am willing to admit that the work so far done under these appropriations for previous years has been desirable and beneficial.

But, gentlemen, here is the question that I would like to call to your attention. There is a feeling throughout the country and throughout this House that the Federal Government has gone too far in appropriating Federal funds and forcing the Federal Government into various lines of activity. I am not discussing the question of State rights—that does not worry me especially.

We have gone, and are going year by year, into new and different fields, and as a result of that general policy the country is astounded to discover the amount of Federal expenses.

Admitting that the Government is doing commendable work in the various States, my amendment proposes to cut down the amount $100,000 per year for each of the next four years, looking forward to the day when the Federal Government will be able to retire entirely from this activity.

As far as I know, the money has been well expended. I am not questioning that proposition, but I am calling your attention to the broad general proposition as to whether or not the Government should not commence the policy of retrenchment and gradually withdraw from many fields of activity for which we are now appropriating money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 3, line 14, after the word "board," strike out the words "for approval."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is not in any way to interfere with the general purposes of the bill, but to make it possible for each State to gage its program to suit the particular needs of that State. The reason I have offered it is because I have observed in the workings under the Smith-Hughes Act and the Smith-Lever Act, as well as the other matching programs, a tendency to put the whole country in a strait-jacket. I say this not in criticism of any program or activity. It is a human tendency. Given a power there is a tendency to use that power. And there is no power like the control of the purse strings. In many of these other activities the State officials are required to report, signing a great long questionnaire giving information; and if they do not carry on their program just exactly as the Federal board requires, they can not get the money. In other words, the Federal board dictates the method, plans, and policies throughout the country. Industry is a little different in many of the States from what it is in other States. The State officials of the particular States should be allowed to map out their program in accordance with the needs of their particular States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reference to the administration of this fund, has the gentleman any knowledge of any conflict, any instance between the direction of the State fund and the Federal board?

Mr. JONES. I have not. I have not had occasion to investigate. I hope it does not exist. But if not, I can see no need in adopting the limitations and thus avoiding any possibility of such a situation arising. But I do know that in each activity that I have investigated I find they are frequently handicapped because in the particular locality they want them to carry on some form of education, some form of training, that is not especially suited to the immediate locality.

My amendment would leave the board free to submit their plans, to make such suggestions as they want to to the States, and the States would still be compelled to use the funds in accordance with the general purposes of the bill. The Federal board could no longer require as a condition to the allocation of the funds that the States must comply with the literal circumstances, terms, and dictation of the Federal board. This is the only change I have offered. I do not see why that would not be a better form of administration. It may be that the training provided in the State of New York is a little different in its needs and characteristics to suit the industries of that State to that which might be best for Texas or Utah or California. I believe that the authorities of the States in the West and the North and the Northwest are better suited to arrange their plans to suit their needs than is one person in Washington who may be inclined to turn down a program of the State that he had never seen, and with the industries of which he was not familiar.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HART. In my State under the Smith-Hughes Act they even dictate the personnel in the schools.

Mr. JONES. I took occasion last summer on complaint to make some investigation, and I found in some instances they have three or four pages of questionnaires, some of them perfectly ludicrous, so far as Texas is concerned. They may be appropriate in some other States. Some of the questions were very proper and pertinent. No doubt all of them were pertinent to some State, some in one and some in another. But I doubt whether all of them were pertinent to any one State. They would be fine as suggestions, but they are poor as dictation. The adoption of this amendment will not interfere in any way with the carrying out of the program. It will simply make the program more flexible, more suited to the needs of the people who would be affected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and ask unanimous consent that it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the Jones amendment.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I think the amendment is not at all necessary. That question was briefly discussed before the committee, and we were assured by those in charge of the administration of this act that particular regard was had to the special interests of each State and that the Federal board in Washington, far from trying to antagonize the State authority, was always in cooperation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wish to state in that connection and for the gentleman's comment, that in the particular cases I investigated they had a form outlined and a form system of questionnaires which they have sent throughout the Nation.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I assume the gentleman is talking about vocational education in a general way?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. The House should bear that in mind. All the gentleman has been saying has been in regard to the general vocational education bill. That is a more elaborate structure than this vocational rehabilitation under discussion and has a more extended purpose, but in the work of the vocational rehabilitation, which, after all, is a very simple work and easily understood, there has not been, on the evidence presented before the committee, any contest or controversy whatsoever between the State and the Federal authorities. Therefore, the amendment itself would be the birth of controversy and contention and should not be inserted in this measure. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 4, after line 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. Section 3 of such act of June 2, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 29, sec. 34), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. That in order to secure the benefits of the appropriations authorized by section 1 any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, (1) accept the provisions of this act; (2) empower and direct the board designated or created as the State board for vocational education to cooperate in the administration of the provisions of the vocational education act, approved February 23, 1917 (U. S. C., title 20, ch. 2), to cooperate as herein provided with the Federal Board for Vocational Education in the administration of the provisions of this act; (3) in those States where a State workmen's compensation board, or other State board, department, or agency exists, charged with the administration of the State workmen's compensation or liability laws, the legislature shall provide that a plan of cooperation be formulated between such State board, department, or agency and the State board charged with the administration of this act, such plan to be effective when approved by the governor of the State; (4) provide for the supervision and support of the program of vocational rehabilitation to be provided by the State board in carrying out the provisions of this act; (5) appoint as custodian for said appropriations its State treasurer, who shall receive and provide for the proper custody and disbursement of all money paid to the State from said appropriations: Provided, That any State which, prior to June 30, 1933, has accepted and otherwise complied with the provisions of the act of June 2, 1920, as amended June 5, 1924, as amended June 9, 1930, shall be deemed to have accepted and complied with the provisions of this amendment to said act.'"

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in explanation I will state that this amendment is merely for the purpose of allowing those four States which have not yet come under the provisions of the act to come under it if they so desire. The essential part of the committee amendment is the last sentence, "That any State which, prior to June 30, 1933," which will be the beginning of the operation of the new act if it is adopted, "has accepted and otherwise complied with the provisions of the act of June 2, 1920, as amended June 5, 1924, as amended June 9, 1930, shall be deemed to have accepted and complied with the provisions of this amendment to said act."

That is the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House what four States have declined to come within the purview of the former acts?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Kansas, Vermont, Washington, and Delaware.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONDON to the committee amendment: On page 5, in line 13, after the word "act," strike out the period and insert a colon and the words: "Provided, however, That no State shall be entitled to the benefits of this act if children under the age of 16 years are permitted to be employed in industry in said State."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not care to argue it. I do not think it is germane to the section of the bill to which it is offered or to the purposes of the bill. I do not think it is a limitation on the authority contained in the section.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the contention made by the gentleman from Alabama that it is not germane to the purposes of the bill——

Mr. BANKHEAD. And to the section to which it is offered.

Mr. CONDON. I would like to address myself to the contention that it is not germane to the purpose of the bill. The first section of the bill provides—

To provide for the promotion of rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry.

It seems to me that if children of tender years are permitted to be employed in industry there is far more likelihood of their disablement in industry by reason of their tender years than if a limitation such as is proposed in this amendment were included in the bill.

With reference to the contention that it is not germane to the section, the section itself expressly sets out the manner and procedure by which individual States shall get the benefits of this Federal enactment. If there is any part of the act that would be a proper place for the amendment, it seems to me it would be in section 3, where the procedure to be followed by the States in order to get the benefits of the act is distinctly set out in the committee amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of New York). The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 5 of such act of June 2, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 29, sec. 34), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board as provided in this act, shall pay in equal semiannual payments, on the 1st day of July and January of each year, to the custodian of each State appointed as herein provided the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act. The money so received by the custodian for any State shall be paid out on the requisition of the State board as reimbursement for services already rendered or expenditures already incurred and approved by said State board. The Federal Board for Vocational Education shall make an annual report to the Congress on or before December 1 on the administration of this act and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State and the expenditure of the money allotted to each State."

With the following committee amendment:

In line 14, on page 5, strike out the figure "2" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "3."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the end of section 2. I do not want to lose my right to offer the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How far did the Clerk read before the gentleman from Texas proposed his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read down to and including line 6 on page 6.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment is to be offered at what point?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is proposed at the end of line 13 on page 5.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment would not be in order. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would sustain the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, then I shall offer it as a separate paragraph, at the end of line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his amendment until the committee amendment is acted upon?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think the gentleman from Texas is still under a misapprehension. The Clerk has read on page 6 and has already passed the section to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. JONES. No; the Clerk just started to read that when I offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment pending which the Clerk has reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 5, line 13, after the word "act," insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"The methods and management shall be within the control of the State authorities. The Federal board may make suggestions and furnish information, but the funds shall not be withheld from any State because of failure of the Federal board to approve the plans and method of such State, provided such State is using the funds herein provided in carrying out the general purpose of this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. I believe the gentleman intends to offer it following line 6, page 6, but as reported it is to follow line 13, page 5. We have passed that section.

Mr. JONES. It properly belongs where I first offered it. I would like to have it there, but the gentleman from Alabama made the point of order it was too late to go back.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order against it being offered at that place.

Mr. JONES. Has the paragraph ending with line 13, on page 5, been read?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I listened for it. I did not understand where the Clerk was reading.

I would like to offer the amendment, then, at the end of line 6, on page 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 6, line 6, after the word "State," insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"The methods and management shall be within the control of the State authorities. The Federal board may make suggestions and furnish information, but the funds shall not be withheld from any State because of failure of the Federal board to approve the plans and method of such State, provided such State is using the funds herein provided in carrying out the general purpose of this act."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I would like to be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The last paragraph on page 5, ending on page 6, refers to the withholding of funds:

The Federal Board for Vocational Education shall make an annual report to the Congress on or before December 1 on the administration of this act, and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act.

You will note the report refers to the entire act—not merely to this paragraph. And the section further requires a report and an accounting of the methods used, the moneys involved and accounted for, and a report—

By each State and the expenditure allotted to each State.

My amendment provides a change in the form of the service that must be rendered. In other words, this whole question of the method of handling, the method of administering, the method of reporting their conduct under, and the handling of the funds under this act are involved, and in this section are the provisions for making the annual report. Here is where they give an accounting of the funds, and here is where provision is made for an accounting as to the general purpose and scope of the act. Any change along the line suggested that covers the general purpose of the act would, it seems to me, be germane at the end of that particular section.

Mr. GREEN. And in that connection, if the gentleman will permit, the committee has just adopted an amendment offered by the committee which was a reinsertion or a reaffirmation of the old act. Therefore, the gentleman's amendment is in order, because we have just adopted one which repeats the old act.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman, and I wish to call attention to the first part of section 5, on page 5:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board as provided in this act, shall pay in equal semiannual payments, on the 1st day of July and January of each year, to the custodian of each State appointed as herein provided the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act.

There is the provision for the payment of the funds. I offer an amendment which will enable him to pay those funds under a little different circumstance. I liberalize the conditions on which those funds may be paid. It is directly germane to the question of whether the Secretary of the Treasury shall honor the requisition and pay the actual money. And I state in the amendment that the funds shall not be withheld because of the failure of the Federal board to approve any plans if the State has complied with the general purposes of the act. It seems to me it is clearly germane to both provisions of section 5.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unless the Chair is prepared to rule, I would like to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear from the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I understood the reading of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], the purpose of it, evidently, is to undertake to formulate a different provision from that set out in the bill with reference to the plans for the operation of this law; that is, probably, with reference to the curriculum, methods of training, and things of that sort.

There may have been a proper place, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman to have offered his amendment, where it might have been germane. For instance, on page 3 of the bill, which we have now passed, are set out matters with reference to the planning of this fund, how the plans shall be made, and such matters; but the gentleman, either by inadvertence or otherwise, failed to offer the amendment at an appropriate place in the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield in a moment. I ask that the Chair read section 5 of the bill. My point of order is based upon the proposition that the amendment is not germane to this section. The Chair, it seems to me, must inevitably come to the conclusion that the gravamen, the substance of section 5 of the bill has nothing whatever to do with the plans of operation under this bill, but only deals with the fiscal policy of making an accounting of the way in which the funds are expended.

By no possible elasticity of construction, it seems to me, could the Chair read into the proposed amendment germaneness to this section 5 because it says:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board, as provided in this act, shall pay in equal semiannual payments, on the 1st day of July and January of each year, to the custodian of each State appointed as herein provided the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act. The money so received by the custodian for any State shall be paid out on the requisition of the State board as reimbursement for services already rendered or expenditures already incurred and approved by said State board.

It merely relates, of course, to a bookkeeping proposition. It does not go—and it can not go, it seems to me—to an elaboration of the plans with reference to how this fund should be expended or used by the different vocational boards.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of New York). The Chair is prepared to rule. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 6 of such act of June 2, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 29, sec. 39), is amended as follows:

"SEC. 6. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education the sum of $100,000 annually, commencing July 1, 1932, for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations, and for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the board may deem necessary, actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees, under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage on foreign mail, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 7, strike out the figure "3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 6, line 11, strike out, after the word "of," the remainder of the line and insert in lieu thereof "$80,000 annually for a period of four years, commencing July 1, 1933."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of the bill, on page 6, line 12, the figures "$80,000" and substitute the figures "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCDUFFIE to the committee amendment: In line 12, page 6, strike out the sign and figures "$80,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$50,000."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I hope no one thinks I am taking myself seriously enough to believe I am going to stop the passage of this bill, nor that I have gotten to be such an economist I can only see through those glasses. Let me say that I found in 10 minutes after I came here about 13 years ago that this Congress could run pretty well in my absence and for that matter it can get along without any one of us.

However, I want to call attention to this paragraph. It is true this is language carried in many paragraphs of similar nature in appropriation bills. Listen to this:

Actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees, under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations.

There is the opportunity to tie in to some other propagandizing firm or organization in the country.

Rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage—

And so forth.

Then they have the authority to hire—

Such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the board may deem necessary.

It seems to me that while this would only be a saving of a few dollars it would not interfere with the proper functioning of those clothed with the authority to administer this act. It probably might do away with a nice visit of a member of the board to a distant State to contact or see some cripple in somebody's workshop where that cripple is learning how to half-sole shoes or being educated in some trade. I respectfully submit a letter might serve the purpose just as well. The travel expenses of our bureaus is an enormous fund, running into many millions.

In the first place, I think this bill ought not to pass, but I think in the administration of this law, which has been in operation for 12 years, we can now restrict the funds allotted for its administration. Assuming we have taught the States—and certainly they have learned something in all of this period of 12 years—how to deal with cripples or handicapped persons, surely there is not the same demand for contact on the part of the Federal Government and for other expenses of administration that would justify the expenditure of $80,000. I submit that $50,000 should suffice.

Remember, these funds are only given to a State after the State complies with the rules and regulations laid down by the Federal Government. Uncle Sam dictates, and properly so, when we use his money.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman has made exactly the same statement I would like to have made when I interrupted the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS] during the delivery of his speech. I am in accord with the gentleman's statement. I think that unless we curtail expenses of this kind we are going to ruin this type of governmental help to those who can not help themselves.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I wish I had the time to read to the committee a report made by a committee that was formed by Secretary Wilbur to study the Federal relations to education. It is quite an interesting volume, and in that report the committee assumes to say that by such proposals as this we have a Federal agency undertaking to dictate as to one particular phase of education or similar activity, and that it is detrimental to the cause of general education in every State. I think that is a fair statement of what that committee said, composed of 40 or 50 great educators of this country.

I call your attention to the possibilities under this language to spend money that is not absolutely essential in a time like this.

I submit to you that $50,000 is ample for the board here in the District of Columbia with which to adequately perform all their duties of supervision. This is a small reduction, it is true, but the principle involved makes it important. The actual work is done and supervised by the various States. The taxpayers of this Nation wish to cut down Government expenses. Let us set an example even in this small sum. I do not doubt the bill will pass as presented by the committee; and I may be wasting your time, yet I hope I may be pardoned for taking the time.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am a little bit amazed at the attitude of the gentleman from Alabama, considering the fact that in his economy report he expressly precluded the abolition of this Board of Rehabilitation that he is now arguing against. I do not question his sincerity. I have always admired him, but I do not know why the gentleman did not do his work then instead of reserving it until this moment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will answer the gentleman. Because this law was to go out of existence, this activity was to cease, and we thought there was some hope of its ceasing. We did not know the gentleman's committee was going to bring it back here and put another $4,000,000 charge on the Federal Treasury.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. In answer to that I will say that if the Economy Committee had been attending to its business and if the Economy Committee had been functioning as it should have been functioning it would have known that the Committee on Education had this report in nearly two months ago. However, that is no answer to my question.

I am not wedded to the amount of $80,000. I must confess that I am taking the word of the Rehabilitation Board as expressed to the committee, and I am but voicing the sentiment of the committee that they were agreeable to what was reported to them by the Rehabilitation Board as the amount necessary to administer this law.

Of course, as the gentleman from Alabama has said, this is the usual authorization in every appropriation bill of this kind. Why did not the gentleman pick his flaws in the other appropriation bills? Why does the gentleman use his eloquence and his ability to attack this particular matter without giving any reason for his position? The gentleman simply makes the broad statement here that $50,000 will be enough, and gives no facts to prove that that amount would be sufficient. On the other hand, I am speaking for the committee, and I am taking the word of what I regard as an honest and efficient agency of this Government, which states that in its opinion it will require this amount for the supervision of the work throughout the 48 States of the Union, and the board has been working on this proposition, under your authority and under your legislation, for 12 years. It is their business, under the law, to supervise the work, to make personal investigations of how these cripples and disabled are making out, and when they say they need this much money, I believe they know the facts. I believe they are honest in their calculation, and I propose that we adopt their recommendation. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. We have already cut them $20,000 below what they asked for originally.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is the fact.

Mr. PATTERSON. And as my distinguished and beloved colleague from Alabama has pointed out, with respect to the item of travel, on this kind of work you can not dispense with travel in getting in contact with these people.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is quite true. I want to reinforce the statement that the original proposition was $100,000 and the Committee on Education, in its sincerity, figured it would not give them the $100,000 but would give the present amount of $80,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I desire to insert in the RECORD copy of a letter and statement I have received from the director of vocational education in Texas, Mr. J. J. Brown, which explains the work that has been done in our State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. I can not understand why there is so much said against a small appropriation for the benefit of crippled children. There is only a small amount involved, and if we are going to make a mistake, let us make the mistake in the interest of the crippled children.

I believe this is a great work. Much has been accomplished for poor people who could not be assisted in any other way.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman's State gets $20,000 of this money. Does the gentleman assume to say that the great State of Texas, of which the entire country is proud, would neglect its crippled, its halt, its lame, and its blind if it did not get this $20,000?

Mr. PATMAN. Possibly not.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Surely not.

Mr. PATMAN. But anything I can do by voting for a bill that will encourage Texas or any other State to conduct this work I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Texas does not need any encouragement along that line.

Mr. PATMAN. If Texas did continue the work, possibly others would not, and we want to encourage this work throughout the United States.

The gentleman desires to reduce this amount by $30,000. The Committee on Education has passed on this, and I am willing to follow what the Committee on Education has done. How much is $30,000? There are many ocean mail contracts that have been let in recent years. There was one contract let last year to a steamship company to carry ocean mail and the contract price is $25,000 a trip, with 52 trips a year. How much mail do they carry? As low as 1 pound of mail, and they receive $25,000 a trip for carrying this mail.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee, of course, will bear in mind that this is merely an authorization of this amount. The Committee on Appropriations, which is now giving all these appropriations very careful scrutiny, has the right, if it thinks proper to do so, to cut this appropriation when the time comes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Or even to dispense with it.

Mr. PATMAN. Under one of these contracts to carry ocean mail $25,000 a trip is spent for no good purpose in the world.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Of course, the gentleman does not mean to say the Government is paying $25,000 to carry one letter across the ocean.

Mr. PATMAN. One pound of letters, and I suspect as low as one letter.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is not the basic purpose. The gentleman knows that when we found ourselves in the throes of a great world-wide conflagration we had no ships upon the sea, and this is a means, if you please, of establishing the American flag upon the seas. The gentleman is not quite as fair as he usually is in comparing this proposition to the ocean mail contracts.

Mr. PATMAN. I know what the gentleman is going to say. The gentleman would leave the impression that it is necessary to subsidize these steamship companies in order to have a merchant marine.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is absolutely true.

Mr. PATMAN. Why subsidize steamship companies that own foreign ships under foreign flags and operate them over the same routes used by the subsidized lines? They are in that way using the subsidies of the Government of the United States to keep up steamship lines flying foreign flags.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not think the Congress has ever been in favor of doing that.

Mr. PATMAN. They are doing it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I myself am certainly not in favor of subsidizing foreign ships.

Mr. PATMAN. They are certainly doing it indirectly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It should not be done.

Mr. PATMAN. And they are subsidizing two steamship lines to carry mail to the same port. That should not be done either, but it is being done.

I merely mention these facts to show you the insignificance of this amount. If we are going to make a mistake, let us make a mistake in favor of the crippled children and, certainly, not reduce this amount below $80,000. [Applause.]

SUBSIDIZED STEAMSHIP LINES AND VETERANS' RELIEF

Mr. Archibald Roosevelt heads the self-styled national economy committee, which wants to reduce veterans' relief. In 1930 the Roosevelt Steamship Co., of which Mr. Roosevelt was part owner and a director, secured a 10-year contract from the Government to carry the mail from Baltimore to Hamburg. The distance is 4,077 miles. The contract price is $6 a mile for 52 trips a year, which amounts to $24,462 a trip or $1,272,014 a year. The service commenced July 1, 1931. To date the Government has actually paid by reason of that contract the sum of $807,246. Other steamship lines would have rendered the same service for not to exceed $28,246. Therefore, Mr. Roosevelt's company received a gift from the Government amounting to $779,004. The Roosevelts are jointly interested with J. P. Morgan in several steamship lines that have contracts to carry ocean mail. One of their vessels went from New York by Plymouth to London a short time ago. It carried 2 pounds of letters. The statutory price for such service is 80 cents a pound. The Roosevelts and Mr. Morgan received the contract price of $6 a mile, $20,214 for the trip, or a gift of more than $20,212. Another steamship company during the last fiscal year rendered service of the value of $95 but received from the Government for this service the sum of $607,792.50. Many other amazing illustrations could be given. I commenced a fight against these gifts January 18, 1930, as disclosed by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. I have recently been waging a fight against international bankers for sandbagging the small banks and for selling the people worthless foreign securities.

The names of representatives of favored shipping interests and international banks appear on the list of Economy Committee members. This committee would like to distract attention of the people from ocean mail subsidies and Colombian bonds to veterans' relief.

EVERY SENSE OF DECENCY VIOLATED

It violates every sense of decency for a group of persons receiving such gifts from the Government to ask that insurance benefits, which the veterans paid for with their own money, and hospital benefits for service-connected disabled be cut off or reduced. These benefits would have to be eliminated in order to make the reduction requested by the so-called Economy Committee. Why not reduce Government costs by cutting off these outrageous gifts being handed out to Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Morgan, and other members of the Economy Committee?

I expect to commence proceedings in the House within the next few days to prevent further payments on ocean mail contracts. If such a measure is enacted, the Government will be saved hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of the actual cost of mail transportation and without interfering with the service in any way.

Under leave to extend my remarks I insert the following:

Statement showing the weights of mails conveyed by contract steamers of the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. (Roosevelt Steamship Co.) each month during the period from July 1, 1931, to April 30, 1932, the contract cost, and what the cost would have been at poundage rates

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

AUSTIN, TEX., February 2, 1932.

Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PATMAN: A rehabilitation bill which deals with our work is now in Congress. It was introduced by Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, and is H. R. 4743. This bill provides for a continuance of Federal aid for our work.

On the attached list you will find a few salient facts concerning the work in this State, and I am sending this to you solely for the purpose of better acquainting you with our work and what we have been doing.

We have had 901 cases reported to this department. Out of the 901 cases, we have rehabilitated at the present time 118 and have 221 people in training. This means that 562 cases that have been reported have not been placed in training. Many of these cases have not been visited, quite a few have been found not eligible, and others are in a state of preparation for training. In other words, placed back in high schools or else placed in hospitals for further physical improvement.

The administration of the work in this State has been limited, since our staff consists of myself and one stenographer here in Austin, and an assistant supervisor located in the Chamber of commerce building in Dallas. The assistant was necessary since we had such a heavy load in the Dallas territory, perhaps largely due to the oil fields and industrial plants.

We have tried to place on the attached sheet such information as we thought you would want to have in your possession at the time the bill was brought before the house.

This office will be glad to answer any questions at any time that you may desire to ask of us, and we will be glad, indeed, to furnish you any information of any nature concerning our work.

As a member of the governor's committee for the relief of unemployment, it is our honest opinion that the rehabilitation department in our State has a greater opportunity for the permanent relief of unemployment than any other agency in our State.

We believe that rehabilitation for disabled people is sound to the very core from an economic standpoint, since it has been costing us only about $296 for each case rehabilitated and taken from a state of unemployment to that of making an honest livelihood.

We hope that Texas will receive your support for H. R. 4743, and, in behalf of the disabled people in our State, we appeal to you for your favorable consideration and your support in continuing this "right of citizenship" enjoyed by handicapped people for 13 years and more needed by them at this time than at any time since 1920.

Thanking you for your support and cooperation in helping these disabled people in our State to regain their earning power, in order to be able to work and support their families, we are,

Yours very truly,

J. J. BROWN,
Supervisor Vocational Rehabilitation.

A FEW SALIENT FACTS CONCERNING THE REHABILITATION PROGRAM IN TEXAS

1. Definition: Civilian vocational rehabilitation is a service of vocational counselling, guidance, training, and placement in employment for all disabled adults. It prepares them and helps them become established in occupations in which they can work successfully and support themselves and their dependents.

2. In 1920 the Federal Congress passed the first law providing for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled civilians in cooperation with the States. This service has been continued "as a right of citizenship" to all disabled persons by amendments to the original act in 1924 and 1929. The present act expires June 30, 1933.

3. Since 1920 the Federal Government has appropriated $1,000,000 annually, which has been allotted to the States according to population. Texas receives under the 1930-census allotment $47,631.06.

4. Our State does not match the Federal allotment, but appropriates $30,000, making a total of $60,000 available for rehabilitation each year. The next legislature will more than likely match the full amount since they have given a substantial increase each year to take care of the increase in work.

5. Since rehabilitation service was established in our State 901 people have applied for rehabilitation service.

6. We now have 339 people who have applied for rehabilitation and are being served by our department.

7. Rehabilitation in Texas is administered as a division of the department of public instruction under authority of the State board for vocational education. The personnel of the administrative staff for the State of Texas consists of:

	Salary
State supervisor, Austin	$3,500
Assistant supervisor	3,150

The following information is being sent out by Mr. Brown to the interested people of Texas:

A CHANCE FOR DISABLED CIVILIANS

Service to those (1) injured in industry; (2) disabled through sickness or disease; (3) physically impaired from birth; (4) physically handicapped from public accident.

Division of vocational education, State department of education, Austin, Tex.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

I. Its purpose

It is the purpose of vocational rehabilitation to render physically handicapped persons fit to engage in occupations which will make them self-supporting, thereby creating happiness and contentment among those individuals and families affected, reducing the number of those seeking charity, lowering county and State expenses for public charges, and checking social agitation and distress through proper social and economic methods.

II. Methods of work

Vocational rehabilitation consists of three phases—advisement, training, and placement. The disabled person is counseled in the selection of a desirable vocation, then given training for the occupation selected and agreed upon in such a manner that the trainee may later use the information gained to follow his chosen vocation; and upon the completion of his training every effort is made to place the rehabilitant in satisfactory employment. The placement in employment is followed up with careful, systematic, regard for the ultimate success of the rehabilitation program.

III. Who are eligible

To be eligible for rehabilitation one must:

1. Have a physical defect or infirmity, whether constitutional or acquired by accident, injury, or disease.

2. Be totally or partially incapacitated for remunerative occupation.

3. Reasonably be expected to be fit to engage in a remunerative occupation after completing a rehabilitation course.

4. Be 16 years of age or over. There is no upper age limit so long as rehabilitation is feasible.

5. Have been a bona fide resident of the State of Texas at the time the disability was incurred, or have lived in the State at least one year prior to time of making application for aid.

The disabled person may be male or female, and of any race.

IV. Not eligible

1. Aged or helpless persons requiring permanent custodial care.

2. Epileptic or feeble-minded persons, or any person who in the judgment of the State board of vocational education may not be susceptible of rehabilitation.

This work is for civilians and has no connection with the work being done by the Veterans' Bureau for disabled ex-service men.

V. How you can help

You can materially aid this great movement by reporting any disabled man or woman in your community on the attached post card. Action will be taken promptly upon receipt of your information.

EXPENSE OF TRAINING

Joint Federal and State funds are available for defraying instructional expenses. These expenses include tuition, which may include books, laboratory fees, and any necessary individual equipment not furnished by the institution or shop giving training.

NOT A CHARITY

In no sense of the word is vocational rehabilitation a charity. It is as definite a part of the plan of public education as are our grammar schools, high schools, colleges, and universities. For the highest development, State and Nation have recognized the necessity of offering special training to incapacitated workers in order that they may fulfill their duties of citizenship, just as they have observed the need of educating every child so that he may fulfill his obligation as a citizen.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of this committee since I have been a Member of the House, and I have paid a great deal of attention to this particular proposition. In the hearings on this Bankhead bill I was very critical of the sum expended in the administration of the bill. I dislike very much to leave the committee at this juncture, but I feel that I must support the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Eighty thousand dollars to take care of the salaries and traveling expenses of six workers on this board I think is entirely too much. We have all over Washington too many reports piled up, too many investigations, too many hearings, all of which are never read.

I think the administration of organized charity—and this is a governmental charity, if there is such a thing—has too much overhead for the amount expended in actual service to the cripples. This cut would be a fine example for organized private charities.

I would much rather see the money taken away from the salaries and traveling expenses and the reports and spread over the actual relief for the dependents. It would be a far better proposition to cut down the amount appropriated for administration. I think that is one of the places where we can economize. It is not a large amount proposed to be cut down. Let charity pay those that need it and cut down the overhead. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to find the distinguished chairman of the Claims Committee rising in behalf of the amendment offered by the distinguished economy expert in this House, the gentleman from Alabama.

A careful reading of the bill and committee report indicates that the whole administrative cost has already been reduced from $100,000 to $80,000; and yet in the name of economy, in the name of the taxpayers, the chairman of the Economy Committee, the gentleman from Alabama, proposes to cut the appropriation still farther, to save a few thousand dollars for the Treasury of the United States.

It was not many weeks ago that the appropriation for prohibition enforcement under the Coast Guard and for the Prohibition Bureau and the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol was pending in the House, with a total annual appropriation for administration expenses of over $40,000,000. Where was the economy expert, the gentleman from Alabama, then?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I did not quite hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SCHAFER. A few months ago this House appropriated for the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, the Prohibition Bureau, and the Coast Guard a total of over $40,000,000 for enforcing the prohibition laws. Where was the gentleman from Alabama, the head of the Economy Committee? Was he bleeding and dying on the floor of the House trying to effect an economy in the name of the taxpayers, the Budget, and the Treasury? No!

A few days ago, after the Economy Committee had supposedly saved $40,000,000 for the poor, battered Treasury, when the House passed the economy bill, after it had been emasculated, by a big majority. Two days later where was the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Economy Committee, when a measure was brought before this House asking for the expenditure of $68,000,000 for Muscle Shoals? That expenditure was not opposed but demanded by the gentleman from Alabama, and the gentleman from Tennessee, who is also a member of the Economy Committee.

This Muscle Shoals appropriation is to be expended in Alabama and Tennessee, so it was deemed proper by the gentlemen from Alabama and Tennessee, members of the Economy Committee, to authorize almost double the estimated savings in the economy bill when it passed the House. And the gentleman from Tennessee is another alleged economy expert. Gentlemen, you are not consistent in your alleged fight for economy in the interest of the taxpayers. I sincerely hope that no Member of this House will follow the chairman of the alleged Economy Committee, the discredited committee of the House, in his bold attempt to make a gesture to show the people that he stands for economy.

The chairman of the Committee on Education properly indicated that the chairman of the Economy Committee did not know what that committee was considering in its drive for economy, because the Education Committee had reported this pending bill and it was on the calendar with a favorable, unanimous report before the Economy Committee was created. The failure of the Economy Committee must satisfy you Democrats. It was your creation and the responsibility is yours. When you voted to create the committee, as I said on the floor of this House in opposition to the creating resolution, you confessed the inability of the Democratic Party, which controls the House of Representatives, to function through the regular standing committees of the House, which are composed of a majority of Democratic Members. Then you are going to ask the people of the country to put the Democrats in power in the Senate and a Democrat in the White House, after you have fallen down so miserably in the control of the House. Oh, you talked about tariff iniquities during the campaign, but when you took control of the House of Representatives where tariff legislation must originate, you did not even attempt to reduce any of the tariff rates you vehemently denounced, not even the tariff on aluminum pants' buttons, but passed a bill to submit all tariff rates to a League of Nations in accordance with the well-established League of Nations policy to which President Wilson had committed the Democratic Party.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the committee, it was proposed to increase the amount over what is now carried in the bill by $500,000. It was also proposed to increase the administrative cost to $100,000. The amount was reduced $500,000, notwithstanding the fact that for every cripple who is obtaining this much-needed service three are unable to obtain it. The committee has cut the administrative cost, and it is proposed now in the name of economy to take $20,000 more off that cost in a service that is dealing with people crippled in industry, and particularly crippled children. I call attention to the fact that a little over 10 years ago the question of rehabilitating children and grown people was almost a new study in this country, and as a result of the stimulation which has been carried on through Federal activity the States have become interested. Fraternal organizations have taken up part of that load, such as the Shrine, Rotary, and the Kiwanis, and they are much interested in looking after the crippled children. It is a new study. You can not put a lot of cripples together into a class under one teacher. It is a specialized work that requires infinite patience, research, and personal supervision.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think the gentleman made a misstatement. The committee has not cut the amount from the original $80,000.

Mr. REED of New York. We cut it in the bill from $100,000 to $80,000.

Mr. HOLADAY. The bureau raised it from $80,000 to $100,000, and this committee put it back to $80,000.

Mr. REED of New York. And it is now proposed to put it back to $60,000. This work requires a lot of research. A man will come in without arms. There was a time when he would be a hopeless derelict. To-day you find such men holding positions, rendering faithful service, helping support families. I know of a case where the child was withered from the hips down, crawling around on all fours, and when company came to the house the parents would put the child out of sight. This child has been educated and trained and is now holding a responsible position helping to support the family. You can take those illustrations by the hundred. It is a subject requiring study not only in this country but in the whole world, and study is being given to it. When I think of all the waste and the pork in some of the bills that go through Congress, the idea of trying to impair this service by a saving of $20,000 seems to me too ridiculous to be brought up before the American Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 41, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect on July 1, 1932.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, page 7, strike out the figure "4" and insert the figure "5."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: In line 5, strike out the figures "1932" and insert "1933."

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONDON: Page 7, line 6, after the figures "1933," strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words: "but it is hereby expressly provided that upon the petition of the governors of at least 13 of the several States the Supreme Court of the United States is hereby invested with the original and exclusive jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of this act, and said court shall prescribe the procedure in order to bring such petition before it for determination."

Mr. LaGUARDIA, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. PATTERSON made a point of order on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of New York). The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLIVER of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4743, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOLADAY. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. HOLADAY. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill who desires to offer a motion to recommit the bill? If not, the Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOLADAY moves to recommit H. R. 4743 to the Committee on Education with instructions to that committee to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendments: Page 2, line 7, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$900,000"; page 2, line 8, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$800,000"; page 2, line 9, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$700,000"; page 2, line 10, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$600,000."

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLADAY) there were—ayes 43, noes 69.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE TRADE VALUE OF ALASKA TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the value of Alaska to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, there are some powerful and responsible Members of the United States Congress who, having neglected to examine carefully into the intimate financial affairs between Alaska and the United States, declare that it is a mistake for the Government to give further aid toward the development of Alaska; that the great Territory is worthless, its natural resources exaggerated, the public funds spent there wasted; that the Alaska Railroad ought to be wrecked, its rails torn up, and the project abandoned; that the Territory is a burden upon and a loss to the people of the United States. These official criticisms are important, if true—but are they?

For the purpose of correcting these false impressions and presenting the trade value of Alaska in its true relation to the United States the following statement has been prepared from official sources. It will disclose the real value of the great Territory to the people of the United States who own it.

1. UNITED STATES TREASURY CASH ACCOUNT WITH ALASKA, 1867–1931

Following is a Treasury statement made by the Assistant Secretary giving the total receipts from and expenditures on account of Alaska from the date of the purchase from Russia on March 30, 1867, to December 31, 1931, inclusive:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 6, 1932.

DEAR MR. WICKERSHAM: Referring to your letter of December 24, 1931, and to conversations with your office since that date in regard to a statement showing the aggregate totals of the expenditures and receipts of the Government pertaining to the Territory of Alaska, the following is now submitted for your information:

Statement of the receipts and expenditures on account of Alaska for the fiscal years 1869 to 1931, inclusive

Fiscal years	Receipts	Expenditures
1869–1924	$28,476,960.23	$127,116,424.60

Total	50,357,660.65	200,117,286.92

The figures shown above include the Postal Service, but the expenditures are exclusive of the purchase price of $7,200,000 for Alaska. These figures, of course, do not include Territorial receipts that are not deposited in the Treasury of the United States nor the expenditures made by the Territorial government from such receipts.

Total, 1869 to 1931	50,357,660.65	200,117,286.92

These two official statements are quoted at length because they show the total cash account between the United States and Alaska from 1867 to 1931, the total cash receipts paid into the National Treasury by Alaska, and the total cash expenditures paid by the people of the United States out of the National Treasury for all national expenditures for or on account of Alaska for that period.

It is necessary, however, to add to the item of total expenditures given above the amount of the purchase price paid to Russia for Alaska to get the grand total, as follows:

Expenditures as above	$200,117,286
Add purchase price	7,200,000
Grand total expenditures	207,317,286

This grand total includes every dollar spent by the people of the United States out of the United States Treasury for the original purchase price of Alaska from Russia and for and on account of every other expenditure pertaining to Alaska from 1867 to December 31, 1931—a period of 64 years. It represents the total capital investment the people of the United States have made in that Territory through their National Treasury.

From this grand total of "expenditures" against her Alaska is entitled to a credit for cash "receipts" paid in the sum of $50,357,660—

Grand total expenditures by the United States	$207,317,286
Subtract "receipts" from Alaska	50,357,660
Net balance due the United States	156,959,626

This statement shows two important facts clearly: First, that the net investment on the part of the United States in Alaska amounts to $156,959,626 only; and second, that Alaska has repaid to the United States Treasury a sum equal to 25 per cent—one quarter—of the grand total of all rational expenditures charged against the Territory from 1867 to 1931. The Territory has repaid to the United States, in cash, one-quarter of the original purchase price paid to Russia for the Territory; one-quarter of the total cost of establishing and maintaining civil government there; one-quarter of the United States military and naval occupation, official salaries, court expenses, the collection of customs and internal revenue; one-quarter of the total cost of the Alaska Railroad, military roads, trails, and bridges—in short, one-quarter of all United States Government expenditures of every kind and character paid for or on account of Alaska by the United States from 1867 to December 31, 1931.

This Treasury cash account also shows the total net capital investment the United States have in Alaska at the close of the year 1931 amounts to $156,959,626!

2. ALASKA'S CREDIT ACCOUNT WITH THE UNITED STATES

Having ascertained the total and net amount of capital invested in Alaska by the United States, let us now find the total credit due to Alaska from the people of the United States, so these figures may have some meaning to persons interested in the problem. It will be interesting to begin this account with some consideration of the principal sources of natural wealth the Territory has produced, in comparison with the small investment which produced and translated them into American trade values.

ALASKAN FURS

Raw furs were the first of the natural resources of Russian America to be exploited by the Russian discoverers. In 1799 the Czar granted the first charter to the Russian America Co., and with it a monopoly of the fur trade in the colony and the supreme control of its civil government. For more than 100 years prior to 1867 the Russians confined their activities entirely to hunting the rich sea otter and fur seal along the coasts, though they purchased land furs from the interior natives. It is estimated that the Russians took out of Russian America between 1745 and 1867 furs to the value of $44,584,000 and left the region quite bare of its most valuable stock. Russia made no effort to colonize the country with free settlers or to develop its fisheries or other natural resources. Its company servants were generally convicts from Siberia, while its native hunters were impressed and poorly paid. When intensive hunting finally depleted the fur-bearing animals, the Russian Government concluded the country was otherwise worthless and sold it to the United States in 1867 for $7,200,000.

When the flag of the United States was raised at Sitka on October 18, 1867, a crowd of vigorous western Americans, filled with the ideas, genius, and energy of a free colonizing people came upon the scene. While the American and Russian military officials were engaged in arranging the formalities for the transfer, a shrewd Baltimore merchant, who had accompanied the American representative sent out to take possession of Alaska in the name of the United States, was closeted with the retiring governor of Russian America and before the ceremony of transfer had closed that day, he had purchased the fleet of Russian vessels formerly used in the Russian fur trade along the Alaska coast.

In 1870 the Alaska Commercial Co. secured the first United States lease of the fur-seal islands for a term of 20 years; in 1890 the second 20-year lease was signed. In 1910 the Government refused to grant another lease, but through its Department of Commerce entered into the control of this fur-seal business as a Government monopoly, which it has conducted ever since in connection with the international claims of Canada, Japan, and Russia.

The Treasury Department prepared a statement showing the total annual receipts obtained by the United States from the fur-seal islands from 1871 to 1931, of which the following is the official summary:

Summary showing receipts of the United States from the Alaska fur-seal islands, 1871–1931

Tax on sealskins	$8,451,711.67
Sale of sealskins	5,680,375.72
Sale of fox skins	916,018.35
Rent of islands for taking seals	990,000.00
Rent of islands for propagating foxes	9,900.00
Total	16,048,005.74

While this total sum is credited to Alaska in the cash-account "receipts" of $50,357,666, no part of it has ever been paid to or expended in any way for or on account of Alaska—it has gone into the United States Treasury.

THE TOTAL MARKET VALUE OF ALL ALASKA FURS

The above summary showing the receipts of the United States from the Alaska fur-seal islands from 1871–1931 does not include the market value of the seal-island furs nor any account of the market value of raw furs from Alaska generally. The market value of both the seal islands and all other Alaska furs is shown in the following official statement:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FISHERIES,
Washington, April 4, 1932.

Subject: Value of fur products of Alaska, 1868–1931.

DEAR JUDGE WICKERSHAM: Referring to your recent oral request, I am pleased to transmit herewith a tabulation showing the production of raw furs by Alaska from 1868 to 1931, inclusive. In accordance with your wishes the value of the fur-seal skins has been separated from the value of other furs. The figures thus submitted have been compiled from the best-known sources for such material. The Bureau of Biological Survey has collaborated and cooperated in this undertaking in regard to figures for furs other than fur-seal skins.

Very truly yours,

HENRY O'MALLEY, Commissioner.

TOTAL MINERAL PRODUCTION OF ALASKA, 1867–1931

Alaska gold production began in 1880 with the location of the first placer-gold mines in Silver Bow Basin at Juneau and the production of $6,000 in placer gold therefrom. About the same time the famous Treadwell-lode claims were located across the bay from Juneau, but this quartz find did not return a yield of gold until 1882. From those dates placer gravels and quartz veins in Alaska have produced steadily and promise a long and continuous golden harvest. Alaska, with her enormous coal fields and widespread gold, copper, and other mineral deposits, is the greatest and most promising mineral region in continental United States. The following statement shows the annual gold production in Alaska, from placer and lode mines separately, from 1880 to 1931, both inclusive:

MY DEAR JUDGE WICKERSHAM: In accordance with your request, I have brought up to date the table regarding the production of gold from Alaska placer and lode mines, and have entered this information on page 177 of the copy of the article I prepared on the Gold Resources of Alaska, which is sent herewith.

I trust this will furnish you the information you desire.

Very sincerely,

PHILIP S. SMITH,
Chief Alaskan Geologist.

This table shows the Alaska placer-gold recovery was greatest from 1899 to 1916, and is twice that from the more permanent but slower-developing lode mines. In 1899 the rich placer deposits at Nome were opened, in 1903 those at Fairbanks, and later those at Iditarod. While the World War closed most of these placer mines, they are being reopened now, worked with huge dredges, and will continue indefinitely to yield large returns. In the meantime the widespread gold-quartz veins, whence the placer deposits were eroded by nature, are being rapidly developed by Alaska miners in a steadily increasing output.

TOTAL MINERAL PRODUCTION OF ALASKA

While gold has yielded the greatest value to date in Alaska, copper follows not far behind. Unlimited deposits of all grades of coal are found widely scattered over the Territory, particularly in the Bering mine field and along the line of the Alaska Railroad. These are not being worked for want of a ready market and because of too-strict laws in relation to their ownership and development. The coal-land leasing system has not proven to be successful, and Alaska coal development must wait for more liberal congressional action in favor of capital.

The following table issued by the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Bulletin 836–A, 1931, shows the value of total mineral production of Alaska, by years, 1880–1931:

1931	12,010,000
Total	641,323,000

In the following table the value of the total mineral production from Alaska, from 1880 to 1931, both inclusive, is distributed among the metals and nonmetallic products. It will be seen that gold leads with a production of approximately 62 per cent; gold and copper together account for about 95 per cent of the total, while silver, coal, and lesser minerals trail along:

Total value of mineral production of Alaska, by substances, 1880–1931

Gold	$398,659,000
Copper	213,964,000
Silver	11,994,300
Coal	7,940,000
Tin	1,094,900
Lead	1,740,500
Marble, platinum, etc	5,930,300
Total	641,323,000

This total mineral production of Alaska from 1880 to 1931, for 52 years, has an average value of more than $12,000,000 per annum, a million dollars per month for 52 years. The gold output alone amounts to an annual average of $7,666,500 for the same period. The people of the United States paid Russia $7,200,000 for Alaska. Alaska gold miners have paid that sum, with interest, annually for half a century into the National Treasury and will, if encouraged in their labors by Congress, continue to do so for centuries to come. An ordinary landlord would consider a return of 100 per cent per annum in gold a good investment in real estate, especially when his tenants also pay 25 per cent of the owner's taxes in addition to the 100 per cent per annum on his investment, as Alaska does.

VALUE OF ALASKA FISHERIES

As large as the mineral production of Alaska has been, it does not equal the value of the Alaska fisheries. Immediately after the purchase of the Territory from Russia in 1867, salmon canners then engaged in packing at the Columbia River began to construct canneries in the far larger and richer shoals of salmon on the coasts of Alaska. Production grew steadily from 1868, and in 1888 the value of Alaska fisheries exceeded $1,000,000 per annum; in 1908 it had increased to more than $10,000,000; in 1918 the value reached $50,000,000 per annum; and in 1928 it rose to the peak of more than $54,000,000 in one year.

The following statement shows the total value of the Alaska fisheries production from 1868 to 1931, inclusive:

The total value of Alaska fisheries imported into the United States markets by United States fishermen during the period from 1867 to the close of 1931 is $907,411,721—it will reach a billion dollars in 1935.

Alaska supplied 60 per cent of the world's total canned-salmon production for 1931. The following is a statement of the world pack for 1931—in cases, each case containing the equivalent of forty-eight 1-pound cans of salmon:

Alaska	5,432,535
Pacific coast States	1,347,057
British Columbia	636,524
Siberia	1,134,702
Japan	458,270
Total world pack, 1931	9,059,988

Alaska's average fishery production from 1867 to 1931 has been more than $15,000,000 per annum. Its waters yield the greatest and best poor man's food supply of any other in the world. Unless Congress can be induced to protect and conserve it from destruction on the spawning beds, and from monopoly and waste in manufacture, it may be depleted and finally destroyed, as has happened in most other civilized countries where these noble fish were once so abundant.

TOTAL VALUE OF ALASKA EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES, 1867–1931

While special attention has been given to furs, minerals, and fish in the foregoing tables of Alaska production it is not intended to suggest that they are the only valuable items of export to the United States, but only that they are those of the greatest value. Those items and a wide variety of other products of lesser value are combined and included in the following statement of Alaska exports, though none are particularly named. They will all be found specifically described in the Alaska customs exports.

Accurate information relating to the trade between Alaska and the United States is officially preserved in the customs reports as fully as if it were carried on between that Territory and a foreign country. Controlled by the same laws and dependent entirely upon capital drawn from the United States, Alaska's trade is a United States trade, both coming in and going out. Alaska's apparent gain in trade is really the Nation's gain; it has a double value in this way to the United States.

The following statement taken from Alaska Customs Reports shows the recent annual and the total amount of Alaska production exported from that Territory into the United States from 1867 to December 31, 1931—furs, fish, gold, copper, and all other items of Alaska export:

Exports from Alaska into the United States, 1867–1931

TOTAL VALUE OF ALASKA IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES, 1867–1931

The foregoing statement of Alaska exports into the United States presents only one side of her trade benefit to the Nation. While gathering furs, mining gold and copper, canning fish, building trails, railroads, homes, schools, and cities, and establishing civil government in a pioneer country, her people have purchased merchandise, manufactured articles, and machinery, and all classes of supplies to carry on their work from United States merchants. The total amount of merchandise purchased in the United States and imported into Alaska from 1867 to December 31, 1931, is shown in the following statement:

Merchandise imported into Alaska from the United States, 1867–1931

1867–1919	$524,885,379
1920	36,876,855

3. BALANCE OF ACCOUNTS, UNITED STATES WITH ALASKA

The foregoing official statistical abstracts enable us to cast a balance of account between the Territory of Alaska on the one hand with the United States on the other and fairly to determine whether Alaska is an asset or a liability to the people of the United States, as follows:

United States cash account with Alaska:
Purchase price of Alaska	$7,200,000
Total "expenditures" by the United States in Alaska	200,117,286
Total cash account, United States against Alaska	207,317,286
Less total Treasury "receipts" from Alaska	50,357,660
United States cash balance against Alaska	156,959,626
Alaska's trade credit with United States:
Merchandise purchased by Alaska	889,233,561
Alaska exports (gold, etc.) to United States	1,691,717,221
Total Alaska trade credits	2,580,950,782
Less balance United States "expenditures"	156,959,626
Balance trade credits due Alaska	2,423,991,156

On a net investment, then, of only $156,959,626 made by the people of the United States through their National Congress, the business interests of the Nation have created a trade from Alaska amounting to nearly two and a half billion dollars. That small investment amounts to no more than a 6 per cent charge against the new business thus created, though it has opened and established a trade which is both permanent and easily enlarged to almost unlimited proportions. Every time the business men of the United States have put 6 cents into this Alaska enterprise they have taken out 94 cents, or fifteen and two-thirds for one! Clearly, then, Alaska is a valuable and increasing asset belonging wholly to the people of the United States, and not a liability. No other Territorial investment heretofore made by this Nation has ever yielded such prompt and proportionately large returns and profits to the business interests of the United States at such a small cost as Alaska—excepting only California.

ALASKA HAS NO TERRITORIAL DEBT

Alaska is the only Commonwealth in or Territory belonging to the United States which has no public debt. It does not owe a dollar and conducts its Territorial government on a strictly cash basis. Its budget is always balanced. If it can not pay cash it does not buy. This exceptional and (just now) happy financial condition arises from the limitations against debt and high taxation in section 9 in its organic act of August 24, 1912 (the constitution of Alaska), which provides that neither the Territory nor any municipal corporation therein shall have any power or authority to create any for mof indebtedness beyond its annual income. The same section of the organic act limits the rate of taxation for all Territorial purposes upon the assessed valuation of property to 1 per cent per annum and limits incorporated towns to a 2 per cent rate. In these days of excessive National, State, county, city, and school-district taxes in the States, these low Alaska rates must look good to those outside of Alaska. Alaska has no public debt and the lowest tax rates of any place under the American flag.

Alaska is one-fifth as large as the whole United States, with a total population of less than 60,000 people, whites and Indians evenly divided, though there was an increase in its population in the last census decade of 7.7 per cent. It is a land of great undeveloped resources; it has produced more gold per annum since 1880 than the United States paid Russia for it, and mining is yet scarcely begun; it has more edible fish in its waters than all other American fisheries combined; greater deposits of better coal than all the Pacific coast besides; better untouched pulp forests than any similar area in American territory; more available agricultural lands than Norway and Sweden; more active volcanoes than Japan; greater glaciers than Switzerland; the highest mountain and one of the greatest rivers in North America.

It has more government per capita, less liberty, and more harmful congressional limitations upon its material development than any other Territory under the American flag. It is almost wholly neglected by its national guardians, and, like Topsy, it has "just growed." Nobody seems to care a damn about what may become of it, but in spite of all these handicaps it is, proportionately, the most valuable asset the United States owns.

GOVERNMENT EXPENSES BETWEEN THE YEARS 1927 AND 1932, AND THE PRESENT EFFORT TOWARD ECONOMY

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of appropriations made by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress are being flooded with letters from their constituents protesting against the apparent enormous increase in governmental expenses in recent years and demanding economy in Government. Some of these letters have been inspired by more or less stereotyped circulars or form letters which have been widely broadcast by several of the large business concerns of the United States. Among the letters that have come to my attention is one from the Du Pont Co., of Delaware, from the Standard Oil Co., and from Armour & Co. In each of these circulars there is given in comparative form a statement of the expenses of government from 1927 to 1932.

The statement points out that there was expended for the major departments, commissions, and so forth, of the Government in 1927, $1,964,000,000 as against $3,195,100,000 for 1932, or an increase of $1,231,100,000. This within itself is a startling disclosure, unanalyzed and unexplained; it is an indictment of wanton extravagance in the operation of the Government. Some constituents in commenting on this showing very naturally point out the fact that the tax bill, which is now in the process of being framed to balance the Budget, calls for the collection of practically $1,250,000,000 in new revenue. They follow with the suggestion that Congress reduce the cost of government back to the 1927 level, and then it will be unnecessary to pass a tax bill. This comparison of appropriations is grossly unjust and manifestly unfair unless it is accompanied by a full explanation of the cause.

Mr. Speaker, I do not for one moment justify the enormous Budget of more than $4,000,000,000 for the Federal Government. It should and must be drastically curtailed. Since Congress convened in December I have repeatedly and consistently demanded a reduction in governmental expenses. As a member of the Appropriations Committee I have supported that committee consistently in its effort to reduce public expenses. In that regard I have advocated a temporary reduction in the Federal pay roll, including salaries of Members of Congress, and the elimination of useless bureaus and commissions, and consolidations and curtailments wherever it could be done without impairing efficiency in the Government service.

I make the above statement in order that my position may be clearly understood to be in keeping with the public demand for a reduction of the Federal Budget. I do desire, however, to point out some pertinent facts in connection with the apparent increase in the cost of government between 1927 and 1932. In this connection I desire to cite here a statement issued by the Director of the Budget under date of April 27, 1932, commenting on this increase in public expenses as set out in the letters to which I have alluded:

MEMORANDUM

APRIL 27, 1932.

In a recent printed circular letter issued from the executive offices of a prominent industrial corporation comparison is made between the Federal expenditures of the fiscal year 1927 and the estimated expenditures of the fiscal year 1932. The letter deducts from the total expenditures of each of the two years the interest on the public-debt and sinking-fund payments, together with certain miscellaneous items, and arrives at balances expended by the major departments and commissions, etc., of $1,964,000,000 for 1927, against $3,195,100,000 for 1932, an increase of $1,231,100,000.

It is to be noted that the comparison is made between a year in which expenditures were the lowest since 1917 and the estimated expenditures of a peak year, when unusual expenditures were being made during the emergency in the interest of agriculture and in aiding employment through an extensive enlargement of the public-works program, increased vessel and aircraft construction, and similar activities involving employment in various departments. For example, in 1927, the expenditures for public works were approximately $188,000,000; the estimated expenditures for that purpose in 1932 are $623,000,000, an increase of $435,000,000. This public-works item includes the Federal-aid highway system in the Department of Agriculture, the enlarged public-building program in the Treasury Department, as well as river and harbor and flood-control work and other nonmilitary construction activities in the War Department.

Other increases over 1927 are: Agricultural marketing fund, $155,000,000; postal deficiency, $167,000,000; vessel construction and alteration in the Navy and Shipping Board construction loans, $75,000,000; aircraft construction and aeronautical activities in the Army, Navy, and Department of Commerce, $47,000,000; care of veterans, including adjusted-service certificate fund, $246,000,000; settlement of war claims act, 1928, in the Treasury, $37,000,000. These increases account for substantially the whole of the increase of $1,231,100,000 referred to in the letter with the exception of about $69,000,000, which represents the net amount of increases and decreases scattered throughout the various departments and is largely for such purposes as aids to agriculture, strengthening the activities of the Department of Justice in the detection and prosecution of crimes, in providing better facilities at penal institutions, increased expenses of the Department of Commerce in completing the decennial census of 1930, immigration and naturalization activities in the Department of Labor, etc.

Because of these unusual activities in the fiscal year 1932 a fairer comparison with the 1927 figures is the estimated expenditures for 1932 as contained in the Budget submitted in December last. Using the same items as were used in the comparison of 1932 the increase would be approximately $772,000,000 as compared with $1,231,100,000. Looking into the causes of this increase, as is done above in 1932, the increase is accounted for by approximately $273,000,000 in public works; $15,000,000, agricultural marketing fund; $128,000,000, postal deficiency; $45,000,000, vessel construction and alterations in the Navy and Shipping Board construction loans; $36,000,000, aircraft construction and aeronautical activities in the Army, Navy, and Department of Commerce; and $243,000,000, care of veterans, including adjusted-service certificate fund, leaving an increase in 1933 of only $32,000,000, which represents net amount of small increases and decreases throughout the departments for purposes similar to those indicated in the miscellaneous increase of $69,000,000 referred to in the preceding paragraph for 1932.

In commenting on these same circular letters, Mr. David Lawrence, in a radio address delivered on May 1, 1932, and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of May 7, at page 9797, has the following to say:

I have examined the so-called 1932 Budget and compared it with the 1927 Budget to discover why it was we had an increase of $1,231,000,000 in expenses. Practically all of the increase was due to emergency appropriations in the interest of construction or agricultural relief or public roads or veterans' expenses.

After analyzing the comparative statement in detail, Mr. Lawrence makes this further statement:

Actually, if we eliminate only veterans' relief and public construction and roads and items having to do with creating labor for the unemployed, the proposed (1933) Budget, with the pending economies, is the lowest the Government of the United States will have operated on since pre-war days.

With respect to the action of Congress in trying to reduce expenses in the interest of balancing the Budget, let us look at a few facts:

When the estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, were sent to the Congress by the Bureau of the Budget, with the approval of the President, they were $369,000,000 less than the estimates for the present fiscal year. The administration has pointed to this fact with considerable pride, as an indication of economies. It is quite true that this is a reduction in expenditures, but as I shall undertake to point out, it does not represent any real economy in government. Let us examine some of the items that go to make up this item of $369,000,000. I quote from a statement made by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee on the floor of the House on May 6, RECORD, page 9716:

The President stated that the Budget submitted in December last provided estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 that were $369,000,000 less than the estimated expenditures for the current fiscal year. These figures are correct, but the $369,000,000 is largely made up by the reduction in construction work and other nonrecurring items which more than offset any increases that are made for 1933. In a statement which was issued from the Executive on December 14 last, showing estimated expenditures, it was shown that the Budget, as submitted in December, contained estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 for construction works of $575,000,000 compared with $780,000,000 for construction works for 1932, a decrease for 1933 under 1932 of $205,000,000. This is a part of the decrease of $369,000,000, which the President referred to in comparing 1933 expenditures with 1932 expenditures. In addition to the construction works decreases there is a reduction in 1933 as compared to 1932 of $140,000,000 in the amounts estimated to be expended from the agricultural marketing fund under the control of the Federal Farm Board. There is a decrease of $37,000,000 in 1933 as compared to 1932 on account of payments of awards under the settlement of war claims act and $3,000,000 on account of subscription to capital stock of Federal intermediate-credit banks. There was an estimated decrease in the amount of the postal deficiency to be paid from the general fund of the Treasury of $40,000,000. Also a decrease of $26,000,000 in refund of internal-revenue taxes illegally collected. Also a decrease of $5,000,000 on account of completion of work on the last decennial census. These decreases more than account for the $369,000,000 of reduction.

The House has made further reductions in the bills passed by the House, including the War Department bill now under consideration, of $161,455,101.56. It should be stated here that the amount just quoted will probably be reduced by from ten to twelve million dollars because of the probable action of the House in putting back in the War Department bill the items for Reserve Officers' Training Corps and citizens' military training camps.

In addition to the reductions just shown in the appropriation bills, the House saved out of the wrecked economy bill items totaling about $40,000,000, making the total savings in appropriation bills and the economy bill more than $200,000,000.

Of course, in fairness, we must note that in the passage of the pension bill—for which I did not vote—we more than offset the savings in the economy bill.

The following is a statement showing the difference between the appropriations for the current fiscal year (1932) and the fiscal year 1933, for which we are now appropriating. This statement shows a total reduction of more than half a billion dollars.

There is every indication that still further reductions will be made in these items in the Senate:

I hope I may say with pardonable pride that of the $161,455,101.56 saved in the 10 appropriation bills passed through the House so far, $54,948,535 of that amount was contributed by reductions in the independent offices appropriation bill. I have the honor to be chairman of the sub-

All of the above reductions were maintained in the passage of the bill by the House. A few additional reductions were made by the House.

Mr. Speaker, there may be some very just criticism of many of the increased expenditures made by Congress in its effort to bring about a revival of business and to furnish employment for the millions of American citizens who are begging for work. It should be understood, however, that ever since the present tragic condition descended upon us there has been a most persistent demand that Congress do something by legislative action to relieve the situation. I have no desire to absolve the House of Representatives from any of the criticism that it deserves. Undoubtedly the action of the House in repudiating its Economy Committee and in many times overruling economy reductions of its Appropriations Committee has made it justly liable to criticism.

It seems to me that out of the chaos of the present situation there are several facts that stand out and of which the American people may very properly take notice:

First. That it is an easy and simple matter to create bureaus and commissions and allow them to grow and expand and an extremely hard matter to ever get rid of them.

Second. That notwithstanding the fact that the Government has been and is a reliable and liberal employer and that its employees from the highest to the lowest have had steady employment, notwithstanding these facts in the present economic crisis, the employees of the Federal Government are unwilling to make any sacrifice whatever or to forego any temporary benefits to help bring the Treasury of the Government back to a sound economic condition. And let it be understood that the employees of the Government apparently have sufficient political strength to prevent any action whatever being taken by Congress that in any way touches their interests.

Third. That when it comes to the consolidation of bureaus and elimination of useless waste and expenses by coordination and cooperation that, so far as the Army and Navy are concerned, there must be a "hands-off policy." Practically every effort to put into effect any economies in either the Army or the Navy has been successfully resisted.

Mr. Speaker, the American taxpayers are long sufferers. In my judgment, a day of accounting is at hand. When we look back at our districts we find a condition that should impress every Member of this body. There is not a business or professional calling that has not felt the blighting hand of the present so-called depression.

The condition among our farmer constituents is deplorable. Doctors, lawyers, business and professional men, and merchants have all been brought suddenly face to face with financial problems. Our laboring people have been cut, not once but many times, and count themselves fortunate if they have any work at all to do. In spite of this condition, we find Members of the House of Representatives yielding to the importunities of this bloc or that bloc, or this group or that group and voting against economies and ofttimes in favor of increased expenditures, knowing full well that an additional tax burden is about to be laid on the backs of the American people.

This is not a partisan matter. Of course, it should be fairly stated that the unbalanced Federal Budget is not a new thing. For the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 there were staggering deficits, and it is not until the appropriations for 1933 are being considered that the demand for a balanced Budget is directed to the attention of the Nation. The Budget should and must be balanced to protect the credit of the Nation and the value of the American dollar, but when it comes to a reduction of public expenses, the wrecking of the economy program, and the refusal to cut salaries or to put into effect economies in the Army and Navy, the honors are equally divided between the two parties. Neither party has the right to place blame or undertake to take the credit.

Mr. Speaker, a few weeks remain until the adjournment of Congress. There is yet time for swift, definite, and effective action by Congress, and we may yet by determined and fearless action write a record we may be able to take back to our constituents as a constructive contribution in the present national crisis.

The House has about finished its work. There is little more of a constructive nature that can be accomplished with the membership in its present mood. There are really only four sources to which we can look for reduced expenditures beyond what we have done, namely, the Federal pay roll, which is nearly a third of the total Budget; the Army and Navy; and the veterans' relief. It has been pretty clearly demonstrated that a majority of the House are now unwilling to make any substantial cuts in these items. Perhaps, after we have gone back to our districts to give an account to our constituents, we will come back next December ready to do the job as it should and must be done.

Congress should adjourn before the political conventions. It is unthinkable to talk of taking a recess without definitely settling the tax problem and passing the appropriation bills. Let the House serve notice on the other body that there will be no recess until we finish. Let us get through and take for ourselves and give the country a much-needed rest.

EDUCATION

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Education, which has considered carefully and reported favorably on the bill, H. R. 4743, to amend the vocational rehabilitation act, to provide for rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise, I desire to make it clear that I personally favored the measure as reported by our committee.

Under ordinary circumstances I do not approve or favor Federal encroachment into any field of endeavor or activity that should be cared for by the States, but the past work of the Vocational Rehabilitation Service has been so successful in securing favorable action in States that have failed heretofore to take steps to provide for those sorely in need of this aid that I feel this work must be carried on at least until every State in the Nation has been won over to the view that it must carry on this work.

This worthy work was first started under the act of June 2, 1920, in cooperation with the States, and was to be carried on for four years. The appropriation for 1921 was only $750,000, and for the three years following was $1,000,000 annually. Due to the success of the work it was continued by act of Congress for six years, with the same appropriation, and in 1930 another extension of three years was granted by Congress to end June 30, 1933. The last appropriation was $1,000,000. The present bill, which I favor, provides for the continuation of this work for four years.

My State—Indiana—has been most fortunate under the appropriation of this money, having in the past few years received the sum of $26,482.55 as its share. This is based on the ratio of State population as shown by the Federal census.

This money has gone to rehabilitate through hospitalization, treatment, and education many hopeless cripples who otherwise would have continued permanently as public charges, dependent on charity alone. They are able, as the result of the rehabilitation work, to work at gainful occupations and earn their own living.

In addition to being noble and humanitarian in purpose, this program of vocational education and rehabilitation has proven a most successful economic enterprise. It is far ahead of the experimental stage and the savings to the public by removing the helplessly maimed and crippled from that category and putting them back into the ranks of self-supporting persons is enormous.

More than 50,000 persons who were public charges or dependent on others for support have been trained and put back to work or made ready for work since this program was begun. The average cost of rehabilitating one person has been reduced down to $221.83. This means that for the sum of $221.83 a person, formerly a public charge and destined to continue a public charge or depend on the support of relatives for life, has been removed from that category and made self-supporting at a cost less than the cost of maintaining one person in an institution of charity for one year.

I believe that tells the entire story.

It shows the economics of the program and removes all possibility of opposition to the program on the theory that it might be too costly.

I have been most deeply impressed by the statement of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education, Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts, when he said in reply to a question:

> I am pleased that the fact has been brought out that we are dealing with a human problem. Under the terms of this bill we are not trying, as we do in some other bills, to develop better or bigger pigs or cows; we are trying to keep men sound and in full use of their faculties for the benefit of the States and of the Nation.

We have appropriated for many years vast sums to be used in the experimental work designed to improve the breeds of livestock and to improve the types of grain, fruit, and vegetables, but this is the only important step ever taken in the direction of improving the human element.

Conditions throughout the country are such that it is not timely to appropriate the funds that were requested by the author of the bill, who sought an appropriation of $1,500,000. The committee, desiring to aid in the general efforts toward economy, felt that it was wise at this time to cut this request, and in making its cut it took drastic action by cutting one-third, or $500,000, from the appropriation bill.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 19, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

AUTOMOBILE TAX

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I send to the desk an editorial from a newspaper called the State, published in my State, in reference to the automobile tax. It will not take long to have it read. I should like to have it read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield for that purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the State, Columbia, S. C., May 18, 1932]

TO RAISE REVENUE BY CRIPPLING BUSINESS IS TO CONDEMN MILLIONS TO WANT AND SUFFERING

South Carolina, Southern States in general, and many of the other States lay an enormous tax on automobiles and derive an enormous income from their use when they place a tax of from 20 to 30 per cent on automobile fuel.

In addition some of these States collect as a license tax on each automobile an amount equal to the South Carolina State tax on real property, with assessed value from $1,500 up to $5,000. In South Carolina the license tax on one of the high-grade cars is more than the State tax on many a 10-horse farm.

That is all right. There is no kicking in South Carolina. But these facts must be borne in mind by southern Senators, especially when it is proposed by the Senate Finance Committee that the National Government put additional and paralyzing burdens upon the automobile industry.

We ask these makers of law to visualize the appearance of any town in any of their States with half the shops having to do with the sale of automobiles, tires, tubes, accessories, and for automobile repairs closed. What would happen to those dependent upon employment in those shops? Or to those dependent upon rent from those shops? And what would happen to the finances of those States so heavily depending upon revenue from the continued full use of cars?

Senators should think seriously about how their States would be affected should the automobile industry be seriously crippled by proposed Federal taxation on cars, trucks, lubricating oil, tires, tubes, and parts.

And the extraordinary fact is that the Senate Finance Committee plans this assault upon the one industry in the country which has demonstrated courage and faith at a time when most industries were afflicted with fear and pessimism; the one industry which has gone forward with a program requiring enormous outlays which would not only give employment to workingmen directly connected with the automobile industry, but by increasing demands for steel and many other products, act as an important bolster to business generally.

To raise revenue by crippling business is to condemn millions to unemployment, want, and suffering. Such measures are criminally stupid. The needed revenues can be raised without crippling business, and they would have been already provided but for the selfish demagogues.

REVENUE, ECONOMY, AND VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I present petitions of several hundred citizens of Rhode Island praying for the enactment of the general sales tax and legislation to balance the Budget. I ask that the body of the petition marked "No. 1" be made a part of the RECORD, and that the petitions themselves be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition praying for the adoption of the manufacturers' sales tax will lie on the table; the other petition dealing largely with veterans' affairs will be referred to the Finance Committee, and the body thereof will be printed in the RECORD.

The petition last above referred to, without the names, is as follows:

To the UNITED STATES SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES FROM RHODE ISLAND.

We, the undersigned citizens of Rhode Island, aroused by the deplorable action of Congress during the past few weeks with respect to revenue legislation, economy legislation, and legislation relating to veterans' compensation and relief, have joined in this petition for the purpose of enlisting your prompt and vigorous support of the measures hereinafter specified.

We heartily indorse President Hoover's message of May 5 and urge upon you the prompt enactment of legislation necessary to accomplish the purposes therein set forth.

We demand "the prompt enactment of a revenue bill adequate to produce the necessary revenue and so designed as to distribute the burdens equitably and not to impede economic recovery."

We demand the prompt enactment of an adequate economy measure along the lines recommended by President Hoover.

We demand (a) the elimination of all expenditures for veterans of the World War who did not in fact suffer disability in war service, (b) a return to the sound policy in which the World War veterans' legislation was first conceived—just and liberal compensation to the dependents of those who lost their lives in war service and to the veterans who in fact suffered some disability in the war, (c) the repeal of the later statutes which permit payments for veterans of the World War who, without suffering any physical detriment to themselves, did no more than perform their duty as citizens, (d) the repeal of the provisions of the Spanish-American pension statutes which permit payments to veterans for disabilities not connected with service in that war, and (e) the reduction of the Federal expenditures by not less than $450,000,000 annually which these reforms would effect.

It is estimated that of all hospital care and treatment for World War veterans over 50 per cent is already for veterans whose disabilities are not connected with war service. Furthermore, as of March 31, 1932, the Veterans' Administration had paid cash disability "allowances" for non-service-connected disabilities to 367,666 veterans of the World War; and it is estimated that by June 30, 1933, 561,000 World War veterans will be receiving disability allowances for non-service-connected disabilities, a prospective increase of 193,334, or 52 per cent in 15 months.

Thus there has insidiously grown up by legislative enactment—so gradually as not to be realized by the people at large—a system of war benefits for men who suffered no physical injury in war service already running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, a burden which will rapidly increase from year to year unless the present laws are repealed.

As testified by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on April 26, 1932, the total amount expended by the Federal Government for veterans of the World War is already "about $6,000,000,000," and if continued "at the present rate without changes in law the Government will have spent $21,500,000,000 in 1945," a sum equal to the cost of the war itself, in addition to which State benefits to veterans of the World War have already amounted to $519,791,000.

The above recitals comprise a few—but a few only—of the facts demonstrating that an immense and growing legalized abuse has been fastened upon the people, which has reached a point which is beyond toleration and demands immediate abatement.

The constantly mounting cost of government has undoubtedly accentuated and is prolonging the present depression. It is estimated that the cost of operating Federal, State, and municipal governments at the present time is over $13,000,000,000 a year, an amount which must be raised by taxation. This is one-sixth of the total estimated annual income of the people of this country. This means that, on an average, each person is devoting one-sixth of his annual income to the support of the Federal, State, and municipal governments, or, expressed in other language, that the wages and other income which he receives for two months' work each year are being turned over to such governments for their support. By far the largest single item in governmental expenditures is that devoted to the payment of soldiers' bonuses and relief.

The fact that an individual pays no income or local tax, or only a small tax, does not mean that he is not contributing his share to the support of the Government. Every single article that he buys, whether it be food, clothing, or anything else, has included in the price that he pays for it a very substantial amount to cover taxes which have been paid by the manufacturers, transportation agencies, and merchants who have produced, transported, and sold the article and the materials that have been used in its manufacture.

When these facts have become known to the American taxpayer, we venture the prediction that such a storm of protest will be raised against reckless and unnecessary public expenditures that the Members of Congress and the other legislative bodies in this country will not dare to ignore it.

Words are inadequate to express our indignation at the way in which Congress has approached these questions. Assailed by the demands of organized minorities, it has weakly yielded to such demands, and by so doing has completely nullified the beneficial effects which would otherwise undoubtedly have resulted from the various constructive financial measures which have been adopted and are now being administered by various agencies, and has brought the country to the brink of economic ruin. It is time that the voice of the vast unorganized majority be heard. You may rest assured that the undersigned, with a host of other voters in the State of Rhode Island, are watching closely the votes of its Senators and Representatives and that a failure on their part to act courageously and in the interest of the public as a whole will be reflected in the vote at the coming election.

This is not a time for the display of partisan politics—the emergency is grave and must be met in a straightforward and statesmanlike manner.

MAY 9, 1932.

USE OF SILVER AS MONEY

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Much has recently been said regarding the use of silver as money and the attitude of foreign countries toward that problem. This morning's New York Times contains an article on the restoration of silver and the position of the next French Government toward an international bimetallic standard of currency, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 19, 1932]

SEES FRENCH MOVE TO RESTORE SILVER—RAYMOND PATENOTRE, WEALTHY DEPUTY, ASSERTS HERRIOT AND CAILLAUX BACK BIMETALISM—HOLDS HOOVER MAY HELP—HE ADVOCATES A RATIO OF 45 TO 1, WITH A MONETARY RESERVE OF 3 PER CENT IN SILVER—SEES CAPITALISM AT BRINK—DECLARES MEASURES MUST BE TAKEN IF IT IS TO SURVIVE—BRITAIN SEEN STEERING POUND

PARIS, May 18.—The next French Government will support a policy of international bimetallic standard of currency, Raymond Patenotre, deputy and one of the wealthiest men in the country, said in an interview with your correspondent to-day.

Patenotre accompanied former Premier Laval to Washington in an effort to win over President Hoover to his views and to induce the President to call a monetary conference. He failed at that time to convince either Mr. Hoover or even the French financial experts in the mission, he admits; but he now says the President seems willing at least to have a conference called, and, on the French side, M. Patenotre asserts he has completely won over Joseph Caillaux and Edouard Herriot to his point of view.

When it is remembered that M. Herriot is to be a most important figure in the new government and that M. Caillaux possibly will be Finance Minister, it will be realized that their support would go far toward swinging financial France into line.

BANK COULD BE OVERRULED

While it is true that Bank of France officials flatly oppose a change from the monometallic, or gold standard and that their influence is naturally very strong, their positions are political appointments, and when they are at odds with the Government they must either resign or change their attitude.

"The world's gold stocks are insufficient for the volume of transactions," M. Patenotre said, "and the production [of gold], far from increasing, is going to diminish after 1934. A return to bimetalism would permit a revival of international trade. It would give back their purchasing power to the Asiatic races. It would reduce hoarding and, in short, reverse the present deflationary trends and start the world back toward normalcy.

"If we don't do something, capitalism is doomed. I don't consider bimetalism the only way out, but monometalism must be abandoned, and it seems to me that a bimetallic standard is the best solution."

What M. Patenotre has in mind is setting a definite ratio of gold and silver at 1 to 45. This would be done at an international monetary conference at which the Banks of France and England and the Federal reserve system would at least agree to adopt bimetalism to the extent of making the currency reserve 3 per cent in silver and the rest of the reserve in gold. In the case of France, for instance, that would mean about $300,000,000 in silver.

M. Patenotre feels there are great objections to the bimetalism which the United States tried, in a limited way, by the compulsory purchase of silver during the nineteenth century. He holds that one country acting alone can not adopt the policy effectively. If an international agreement were reached, he says, the fluctuations in the value of silver and its ratio toward gold would be kept at such a minimum as to permit the ratio to stand for at least 5 to 10 years.

Needless to say, the adoption of the Patenotre plan would mean a reversal of France's traditional policy, which is firmly for the gold standard and for a slow and cautious return to normal conditions.

DAIRY AND CREAMERY INDUSTRY IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS presented a letter from the Philadelphia Dairy Jobbers Association, signed by Joseph Buschel, its secretary, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator JAMES J. DAVIS,
3012 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SENATOR DAVIS: The Philadelphia Dairy Jobbers Association, realizing the importance of proper representation on the various boards and committees to whom is intrusted the task of determining to what industries the Government should extend its aid, want to take this means of going on record regarding certain dealings with such representation.

The Philadelphia Dairy Jobbers Association comprises citizens of the United States and taxpayers of Philadelphia, the largest city in Pennsylvania and the second largest city in the eastern section of the United States. It is engaged in the selling and distribution of farm and dairy products for the farmers of Pennsylvania and surrounding States.

The Pennsylvania farmers and distributors are not in any manner recipients of Government aid, and under the circumstances are greatly handicapped by other Government-aided distributors and farmers from other States that have invaded Pennsylvania territory.

Under date of March 12, 1932, the following nominations of the Farm Board were approved by Senate:

Frank Evans, Samuel H. Thompson, and William F. Schilling.

We quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5881, March 12, 1932, in substantiation of our contentions of existing discrimination in having to compete with the Government-aided distributors of other States, Senator MCNARY quoted:

"Thirty-nine years ago Mr. Schilling organized the first great creamery in the State of Minnesota, and he is to-day the leading spirit in the Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.)."

The true state of affairs is that the Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.), of which, according to Senator MCNARY, Mr. Schilling, of Minnesota, is the moving spirit, is the worst competitor in the State of Pennsylvania with which the Pennsylvania farmers and dairy distributors have to contend.

The actual practice of the Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.) is very much at variance with the intent and the purposes for which it was chartered. According to the purpose clause of Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.), under article 2, cooperative file No. 84, State of Minnesota, department of state, filed June 11, 1924—

"To market and sell on the cooperative plan the creamery, cheese, dairy, poultry, and agricultural products of its members."

Originally, therefore, it was intended to help out only those who could not help themselves in the marketing of their products and their scope limited to members only. In actual practice, however, it has been stated that the Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.) has been purchasing products from others than their members and bringing such products into Pennsylvania markets, thereby doing a general merchandising business in competition to private enterprises.

Under date of March 26, 1932, the Produce News quoted W. F. Jensen, secretary-manager of the American Association of Creamery Butter Manufacturers, as follows. Jensen says:

"Government aid alone enables them to rival private firms."

And in a number of other daily papers considerable light has been shed on the Government aid to such cooperatives with a detrimental effect on the private-business enterprises, and contributory to the piling up of losses.

Government advances to such cooperatives have contributed considerably to the present chaotic state of the dairy and creamery industry in Pennsylvania, and we take this means of petitioning you to use your good efforts to remedy this condition by withdrawing Government aid from the privileged organizations and thereby better the conditions of our industry in Pennsylvania.

Yours very truly,

[SEAL.] PHILADELPHIA DAIRY JOBBERS ASSOCIATION, JOSEPH BUSCHEL, Secretary.

THE RELIEF SITUATION

Mr. TRAMMELL presented a letter from members of Local Union No. 177, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of Jacksonville, Fla., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS,
Jacksonville, Fla., May 6, 1932.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are appealing to you and the Congress of the United States to do something for the jobless, hungry workers of your State and everywhere, where suffering and acute distress exist. We have hoped that spring would bring relief in some form of seasonal employment—in vain. Instead of relief we are faced with more and more unemployment, at a season when industrial employment should show a seasonal gain.

Our people are losing their homes because they are unable to pay rent or taxes. Our relief appropriations are exhausted, and the source of further funds, a majority of which must come from other workers, is closed because of the retrenchment policy of the Federal Government. They can't help but feel insecure in the face of wage and salary reductions forced upon them by employers who follow the example set by Congress.

Such reductions not only affect pay rolls but subsequent retrenchment on the part of others and loss of confidence all the way down the line. Where is it going to end? Those people to whom we are all looking to inaugurate some definite relief program, are going to be faced with something more serious than the feeble protests of a determined populace—unless something is done to end this national tragedy.

This is an emergency if ever there was one—emergency measures should be adopted. Every dollar taken out of circulation only adds to the lengthening soup lines and causes the wheels of industry to slow down.

Now that the railroads and the poor bankers have had their slice of cake, isn't it about time that the policy of wage and salary reductions cease long enough to give the workers their crumb of bread? Are you going to use your influence and vote to give them relief—we want to know.

Yours truly,

MEMBERS OF LOCAL NO. 177,
E. C. VALENTINE, President.

PAY OF PRINTERS UNDER ECONOMY PLAN

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter from Clyde M. Mills, president of the Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, No. 101,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We believe it the duty of this union to point out to Members of Congress some of the inequalities contained in the economy bill, H. R. 11267. Knowing your keen interest in this matter, we will attempt to explain our interpretation of the bill, that you may be able to vote with full knowledge of our position and the reasons therefor.

We will refer, of course, to the position of the printers employed in the Government Printing Office, but the expressions represent all the allied trades, pressmen, bookbinders, women bindery workers, electrotypers, photo-engravers, stereotypers, and machinists. There is very little difference in the wages paid the different trades and the working conditions are practically the same.

Employees of the Government Printing Office work under agreements having definite dates of expiration. The law setting forth the right of employees of the office to make agreements is found in the Kiess bill, H. R. 7996, Public, No. 276, entitled "An act to regulate and fix rates of pay for employees and officers of the Government Printing Office," enacted by Congress June 7, 1924. We quote one paragraph:

"* * * Provided further, That except as hereinbefore provided, the rates of wages, including compensation for night and overtime work, for more than 10 employees of the same occupation shall be determined by a conference between the Public Printer and a committee selected by the trades affected, and the rates and compensation so agreed upon shall become effective upon approval by the Joint Committee on Printing; if the Public Printer and the committee representing any trade fail to agree as to wages, salaries, and compensation, either party is hereby granted the right of appeal to the Joint Committee on Printing, and the decision of said committee shall be final; the wages, salaries, and compensation determined as provided herein shall not be subject to change oftener than once a year thereafter * * *."

Section 103, subsection (d) of the present bill, in the first part of the sentence, exempts all employees working under agreements reached under the above law or similar laws; but in the last part of the sentence such wage boards are directed to immediately effect a readjustment in conformity with prevailing local rates for similar work. But the inconsistency is found in section 207, Title II, which specifically provides that no employee shall receive a higher rate of pay for night work, for overtime work, or for work performed on Sundays or holidays; yet the act of Congress granting the power to wage boards to fix such rates is not repealed.

Section 207 referred to reads:

"During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, no employee or officer of the Government shall be allowed or paid a higher rate of compensation for overtime work, for night work, or for work on Sundays and holidays. In so far as practicable, overtime work and night work shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a day's work during the day during which the overtime work or night work is to be performed, and work on Sundays and holidays shall be performed by substitutes in lieu of persons who have performed a week's work during the same week * * *."

The employment of substitutes either for overtime work or other work is not in effect in the Government Printing Office, neither can it be made to apply without drastic changes. There is very little overtime hours worked at the office. Night workers are not employed during any other hours of the day. They work eight hours at night.

There are now employed at night in the office 647 tradesmen. Of this number 501 are printers, 18 platemakers, 85 pressmen, 43 bookbinders. The scale of wages run from $1.15 per hour to $1 per hour. The largest number receive $1.10; this hourly rate multiplied by 8 hours per day totals $8.80. Wages are still based on 48 hours per week, making a total of $52.80 and a yearly total of 52 weeks, $2,745.60. To this is added 15 per cent for night work, $426.84, which will be taken away upon adoption of the existing section 207.

We can not believe there is a Member of Congress who sincerely believes that a printer earning $3,000 per year should be reduced in the amount contemplated in the adoption of section 207. That belief is based on the action of the House in exempting from any reduction earnings of $2,500 or less and letters from several Representatives who say they did not fully understand the full intent of the section.

Practically all work produced at night in the office is for Congress, such as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which must be on the desks of Members of Congress early in the morning; new bills; reports of hearings; and other such items. There would be very little necessity for night work were it not for the requirements of Congress.

We can see no reasonable argument why any reduction larger than that directed to per annum and per diem employees working during the day should be directed to night workers.

We believe that a large number of Members of Congress are under the impression that employees of the Government Printing Office receive sick leave. These employees do not receive any sick leave.

The following tables have been compiled upon our interpretation of the two most-talked-of plans, the President's furlough plan and the direct pay cut. While the totals may vary slightly from Bureau of Efficiency figures, please consider that we are not trained in the matter of statistics, but we believe the figures are very nearly correct:

Comparative losses under the two plans

Hourly rate	$1.10
H. R. 11267:
11 per cent	37.02
Loss night pay	426.84
Total	463.86
President's furlough plan:
5-day week	249.60
Loss night pay	426.84
Leave	264.00
Total	940.40

Under the 11 per cent reduction in pay for Members of Congress you will be reduced $825. Under the same plan a printer will be reduced $463.84. Under the President's plan of 10 per cent reduction for Congress you would be reduced $1,000. A printer, under the same plan, will receive $940.40 less. And the printer's salary is $3,000 as against $10,000 for Members of Congress.

The principle of a higher rate of pay for night work and overtime has been established in industry, especially the printing trades, for more than 40 years. It is extremely unfair, in our opinion, for Congress, which should set a standard for all industry, to take from us that which we have gained through years of effort.

We wish to emphasize that night work in the office is not overtime. We also call attention to the fact that printers work 44 hours per week, and again that they do not receive sick leave.

We feel confident of your support in striking out section 207 after considering all these facts.

Thanking you for your past cooperation and support and assuring you of our sincere friendship, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

CLYDE M. MILLS, President.

"THE FORGOTTEN MAN"—ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, at Warm Springs, Ga., on yesterday Governor Roosevelt in an extemporaneous address to the Kiwanis Clubs made some references to the needs of the poor of this country that are so much in point I should like to have them included in the RECORD. I want to read one paragraph from the address.

No one wants government to assume more functions, but it is clear that government in this Nation can not let its people starve. The government in the United States must not allow its men, women, and children to suffer excessive privation.

Then in another part of the address Governor Roosevelt said:

I believe that some one has spoken of the forgotten man. But there is also the forgotten child. One of the great advances of current life is that it is becoming increasingly difficult to find a physically handicapped, forgotten child who requires help.

I think, coming from a man holding the position which the Governor of New York holds, that this address is of special interest, and I ask that the report of the address as published in the New York Times may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 19, 1932]

ROOSEVELT RENEWS "FORGOTTEN" PLEA—GOVERNMENT MUST NOT LET ITS PEOPLE STARVE, HE TELLS GEORGIA KIWANIANS—CITES JEFFERSON'S WORDS—"MASS OF MANKIND WAS NOT BORN WITH SADDLES," HE QUOTES, URGING A NEW OUTLOOK

WARM SPRINGS, GA., May 18.—Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in an address before Georgia Kiwanians, made a demand for the "forgotten man" and assailed "privilege in the saddle."

Seizing on sentences from the last letter to Thomas Jefferson, which were sent to the governor by a correspondent who had been stirred by attacks on his previous views expressed on economic relief, Mr. Roosevelt declared that the National Government must take steps to prevent starvation among its men, women, and children. A proper outlook on government, he insisted, would bring this result.

The governor spoke extemporaneously, and while many of his statements were directed specifically toward cooperation in aiding the physically handicapped, they were broadened to include the entire economic picture, when the words of Thomas Jefferson were invoked.

Governor Roosevelt made it clear that he was applying the Jeffersonian formula to the whole social structure when he insisted that the words in which the "Sage of Monticello" attacked the idea of inherent servility of the masses were as sound to-day as in 1826, when they were written.

The governor even used the term "forgotten man" again, the words which, it is said, gave rise to the speech of former Governor Smith denouncing "demagogues."

The governor opened his address by praising the Kiwanis organization for the aid it had offered to the handicapped to obtain treatment.

Kiwanis, he said, had a great opportunity in making itself known as the "friend of the forgotten man."

Mr. Roosevelt continued:

"Only this morning I received a letter in the mail containing a quotation from the last letter of Thomas Jefferson. It was written by him two days before his death on July 4, 1826, and was in response to an invitation to go to the District of Columbia to attend the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence.

"Jefferson wrote from Monticello that he was sorry his illness would prevent his attendance. It was a simple letter, and his sentence was written as death was guiding his hand:

"'The mass of mankind was not born with saddles on their backs, nor were a favored few born booted and spurred, ready to ride mankind, either legitimately or by the grace of God.'

"That was a clear, forceful expression, and I think it is as true to-day as it was in 1826. The mass of the people were not born with saddles on their backs. We know that many of them do have saddles on their backs nevertheless. But they can be removed by the right kind of outlook in government in this country.

"No one wants government to assume more functions, but it is clear that government in this Nation can not let its people starve. Government in the United States must not allow its men, women, and children to suffer excessive privation.

"In normal times we all hope that some way will be devised to avoid any increase in governmental functions, but in what you might call exceptional times like these certain functions must be maintained.

"I think these are times when we could well rely on the words of the Bible again—those in one of the commandments. I think that the country would work more readily, not back to great prosperity but to comparative prosperity, if we remember those words.

"We will come more easily to the day when food, clothing, and a roof will be guaranteed to the men, women, and children of the Nation if we appreciate genuinely and apply practically that commandment: 'Love thy neighbor as thyself.'"

The governor avowed earlier in the address that declaration of basic principles of this sort were more necessary now than ever before.

"I want to talk very briefly," he said, "about some of the confusing elements in modern life. We have fallen on evil times. The average man and woman is confused as to his or her rights and duties.

"There is confusion as to the place of private endeavor and government action. In these times we must clarify what the government can let go of and what it must continue to hold."

Governor Roosevelt asserted that government in this country had undoubtedly "overstepped itself in extravagance" in the past decade in city, State, and Nation, and declared that curtailment was necessary as far as possible. At the same time he repeated his demand that social welfare activities of government should not be "scrapped" in economy programs.

"Social welfare functions," he said, "can not be thrown aside in time of stress, for that would mean a regression in our civilization. We must continue them, unless we can find some private group to operate them more cheaply and efficiently."

"I believe that some one," the governor smiled, "has spoken of the forgotten man. But there is also the forgotten child. One of the great advances of current life is that it is becoming increasingly difficult to find a physically handicapped, forgotten child who requires help."

The governor urged the Kiwanians to recognize the economic efficiency of aiding the physically handicapped by expenditure of money for training them for useful occupations, on the ground that the earning power created would be far greater than the money spent for the training and aid."

Gov. Richard B. Russell, jr., of Georgia, was another speaker at the dinner. He said:

"We hear to-day the voice of America summoning this great part-time Georgian to the tremendous task of rehabilitating and rebuilding this Republic. A leader has arisen and is recognized by the people as the one to restore government to the people and reestablish a firm democracy.

"We can feel sure that under his leadership the clouds of depression will be lifted."

Governor Roosevelt received an ovation when Governor Russell concluded.

The governor took his usual exercises in the pool during the day and was guest later at the cottage of Mr. and Mrs. Linn Pierson, of Detroit.

ENCYCLICAL OF POPE PIUS XI

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD a message delivered by Pope Pius XI. I merely want to read one paragraph from it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield for that purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am willing to do so, provided I do not lose the floor; but I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he will not be as brief as he can?

Mr. LONG. What I desire to be read embraces only seven or eight lines.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I merely desire to read these few lines from the message of Pope Pius XI:

From greed arises mutual distrust that casts a blight on all human dealings; from greed arises hateful envy which makes a man consider the advantages of another as losses to himself; from greed arises narrow individualism which orders and subordinates everything to its own advantage without taking account of others, on the contrary, cruelly trampling under foot all rights of others. Hence the disorder and inequality from which arises the accumulation of the wealth of nations in the hands of a small group of individuals who manipulate the market of the world at their own caprice, to the immense harm of the masses, as we showed last year in our encyclical letter, "Quadragesimo Anno."

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Louisiana for having placed in the RECORD one of the best arguments I have ever heard against the oil tariff.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the encyclical message of Pope Pius XI, issued yesterday, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the encyclical referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(VATICAN CITY, May 18.—Following is the full text of the encyclical of Pope Pius XI calling upon the world to unite in prayer for divine assistance in overcoming the prevailing universal distress:)

ENCYCLICAL LETTER

To the Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, Bishops, and other ordinaries in peace and communion with the Apostolic See, on offering prayer and expiation to the sacred heart of Jesus in the present distress of the human race:

Venerable brethren, health and apostolic benediction.

Urged by the charity of Christ, we have invited with the encyclical Nova Impendet of October 2 of last year, all members of the Catholic Church, indeed all men of good will, to unite in a holy crusade of love and succor, in order to alleviate in some measure the terrible consequences of the economic crisis under which the human race is struggling. And truly wonderful was the unanimous enthusiasm with which the generosity and activity of all answered our appeal. But distress has increased, the number of the unemployed has grown in practically all parts, and subversive elements are making use of the fact for their propaganda; hence public order is threatened more and more and the peril of terrorism and anarchy hangs over society ever more ominously.

Such being the case, the same charity of Christ moves us to turn once again to you, venerable brethren, to the faithful in your charge, to the whole world, and to exhort all to unite and to resist with all their might the evils that are crushing humanity and the still graver evils that are threatening.

Chapter I

UNIVERSALITY OF DISTRESS

If we pass in review the long and sorrowful sequence of woes that, as a sad heritage of sin, mark the stages of fallen man's earthly pilgrimage from the flood on, it would be hard to find spiritual and material distress so deep, so universal, as that which we are now experiencing; even the greatest scourges that left indelible traces in the lives and memories of peoples struck only one nation at a time.

Now on the contrary the whole of humanity is held bound by the financial and economic crisis, so fast that the more it struggles the harder appears the task of loosening its bonds.

There is no people, there is no state, no society, or family which, in one way or another, directly or indirectly, to a greater or less extent, does not feel the repercussion. Even those, very few in number, who appear to have in their hands, together with enormous wealth, the destinies of the world, even those very few who with their speculations were and are in great part the cause of so much woe, are themselves quite often the first and most notorious victims, dragging down with themselves into the abyss the fortunes of countless others; thus verifying in a terrible manner and before the whole world what the Holy Ghost had already proclaimed for every sinner in particular: "By what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented."

This deplorable state of things, venerable brethren, makes our paternal heart groan and makes us feel more and more deeply the need of adopting, in the measure of our insufficiency, the sublime sentiment of the sacred heart of Jesus: "I have compassion on the multitude."

But still more deplorable is the root from which springs this condition of affairs, for if what the Holy Ghost affirms, through the mouth of St. Paul, is ever true, much more it is true at present: "The desire of money is the root of all evils."

Is it not that lust of earthly goods that the pagan poet called with righteous scorn "the accursed hunger for gold"; is it not that sordid egoism which too often regulates the mutual relations of individuals and society; is it not, in fine, greed, whatever be its species and form, that has brought the world to a pass we all see and deplore?

From greed arises mutual distrust that casts a blight on all human dealings; from greed arises hateful envy which makes a man consider the advantages of another as losses to himself; from greed arises narrow individualism which orders and subordinates everything to its own advantage without taking account of others, on the contrary cruelly trampling under foot all rights of others. Hence the disorder and inequality from which arises the accumulation of the wealth of nations in the hands of a small group of individuals who manipulate the market of the world at their own caprice, to the immense harm of the masses, as we showed last year in our encyclical letter Quadragesimo Anno.

FINDS A FEW CONTROL WEALTH OF NATIONS

The right order of Christian charity does not disapprove of lawful love of country and a sentiment of justifiable nationalism; on the contrary, it controls, sanctifies, and enlivens them. If, however, egoism, abusing this love of country, and exaggerating this sentiment of nationalism insinuates itself into the relations between people and people, there is no excess that will not seem justified, and that which between individuals would be judged blameworthy by all is now considered lawful and praiseworthy if it is done in the name of this exaggerated nationalism.

Instead of the great law of love and human brotherhood, which embraces and holds in a single family all nations and peoples with one Father, who is in heaven, there enters hatred, driving all to destruction. In public life sacred principles, the guide of all social intercourse, are trampled upon; the solid foundations of right and honesty on which the state should rest are undermined.

Profiting by so much economic distress and so much moral disorder the enemies of all social order, be they called communists or any other name, boldly set about breaking through every restraint. This is the most dreadful evil of our times, for they destroy every bond of law, human and divine; they engage openly and in secret in a relentless struggle against religion and against God himself; they carry out the diabolical program of wresting from the hearts of all, even of children, all religious sentiment; for well they know that when once belief in God has been taken from the heart of mankind they will be entirely free to work out their will.

Thus we see to-day what was never before seen in history—the satanical banners of war against God and against religion brazenly unfurled to the winds in the midst of all peoples and in all parts of the earth. Polluted and closed are the sources of those ancient traditions which, based on faith in God and fidelity to His law, secured the true progress of nations.

There were never lacking impious men nor men who denied God; but they were relatively few, isolated and individual, and they did not care or did not think it opportune to reveal too openly their impious minds, as the inspired psalmist appears to suggest, when he exclaims, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." The impious, the atheist, lost in the crowd, denies God, his creator, but in the secret of his heart.

ATHEISM SPREADING THROUGH MASSES

To-day, on the contrary, atheism has already spread through large masses of the people. Well organized, it works its way even into the common schools; it appears in theaters; in order to spread it makes use of its own cinema films, of the gramophone, and the radio; with its own printing presses it prints booklets in every language; it promotes special exhibitions and public parades; it has formed its own political parties and its own economic and military systems.

This organized and militant atheism works untiringly by means of its agitators, with conferences and projections, with every means of propaganda, secret and open; among all classes, in every street, in every hall; it secures for this nefarious activity the moral support of its own universities and holds fast the unwary with the mighty bonds of its organizing power.

At the sight of so much activity placed at the service of so wicked a cause there comes spontaneously to our mind and to our lips the mournful lament of Christ: "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

The leaders of this campaign of atheism, turning to account the present economic crisis, inquire with diabolic reasoning into the cause of this universal misery. The holy cross of our Lord, symbol of humility and poverty, is joined together with the symbols of modern imperialism, as though religion were allied with those dark powers which produce such evils among men.

Thus they strive, and not without effect, to combine war against God with men's struggle for their daily bread, with their desire to have land of their own, suitable wages, and decent dwellings—in fine, a condition of life befitting human beings.

ALL RECOGNIZING GOD ARE UNDER ATTACK

The most legitimate and necessary desires, just as the most brutal instincts, everything serves their antireligious program, as if the order established by God stood in contradiction with the welfare of mankind and were not, on the contrary, its only sure safeguard; as if human forces by means of modern mechanical power could combat the divine forces and introduce a new and better ordering of things.

Now it is a lamentable fact that millions of men, under the impression that they are struggling for existence, grasp at such theories, to the utter subversion of truth, and cry out against God and religion. Nor are these assaults directed only against the Catholic religion but against all who still recognize God as creator of heaven and earth and as absolute Lord of all things.

And the secret societies, always ready to support war against God and the church, no matter who wages it, do not fail to inflame ever more this insane hatred which can give neither peace nor happiness to any class of society but will certainly bring all nations to disaster.

Thus this new form of atheism, whilst unchaining man's most violent instincts, with cynical impudence proclaims that there will be neither peace nor welfare on earth until the last remnant of religion has been torn up and until its last representative has been crushed out of existence; as if in this way could be silenced the marvelous concert in which creation chants the glory of its Creator.

Chaper II

THE ADVANCE OF FAITH

We know very well, venerable brethren, that vain are all these efforts, and that in the hour He has established, God will arise and His enemies shall be scattered. We know that "the gates of hell shall not prevail." We know that our Divine Redeemer, as was foretold of Him, "shall strike the earth with the rod of His mouth and with the breath of His lips He shall slay the wicked," and for those unhappy beings terrible above all things will be the hour in which they fall "into the hands of the living God."

And this unshaken confidence in the final triumph of God and the Church is, through the infinite goodness of the Lord, strengthened for us every day by the consoling sight of the generous enthusiasm for God on the part of countless souls in every quarter of the world and in all classes of society.

It is indeed a powerful breathing of the Holy Spirit which is now passing over all the earth, drawing especially the souls of the young to the highest Christian ideals, raising them above all human respect, rendering them ready for every sacrifice, even the most heroic; a divine breath that stirs all hearts, even in spite of themselves, and causes them to feel an inward impulse, a real thirst for God, to be forgiven by those who dare not confess it.

It is also true that our invitation to the laity to take part in the apostolate of the hierarchy in the ranks of Catholic action has been everywhere received with docility and generosity. In the cities and in the country the number is continuously increasing of those who with all their strength devote themselves to the propagation of Christian principles and to their practical application in public life, while they themselves strive to confirm their words with the example of their upright lives.

But none the less, confronted with so much impiety, such destruction of all the holiest traditions, such slaughter of immortal souls, such offenses against the Divine Majesty, we can not, venerable brethren, refrain from pouring out the bitter grief of our soul; we can not refrain from raising our voice and, with all the energy of our apostolic heart, taking the defense of the downtrodden rights of God and of the most sacred sentiments of the human heart that has absolute need of God; and this all the more since these hostile forces, impelled by the spirit of evil, do not content themselves with mere clamor, but unite all their strength in order to carry out at the first opportunity their nefarious designs.

Woe to mankind if God, thus spurned by his creatures, allows in His justice free course to this devastating flood and uses it as a scourge to chastise the world! It is necessary, therefore, venerable brethren, that without faltering we "get up a wall for the house of Israel," that we likewise unite all our forces in one solid, compact line against the battalions of evil, enemies of God no less than of the human race.

For in this conflict there is really question of the fundamental problem of the universe and of the most important decision proposed to man's free will. For God or against God, this once more is the alternative that shall decide the destinies of all mankind. In politics, in finance, in morals, in the science and arts, in the state, in civil and domestic society, in the East and in the West, everywhere this question confronts us as the deciding factor because of the consequences that flow from it. Thus even the advocates of an altogether materialistic conception of the world always see rising before them the question of the existence of God that they thought had been ruled out once and for all and are ever constrained to take up again its discussion.

In the name of the Lord, therefore, we conjure individuals and nations, in the face of such problems and in the throes of a conflict of such vital interest for mankind, to put aside that narrow individualism and base egoism that blinds even the most clear-sighted, that withers up all noble initiative as soon as it is no longer confined to a limited circle of paltry and particular interests. Let them all unite together even at the cost of heavy sacrifices to save themselves and mankind.

In such a union of minds and forces they naturally ought to be the first who are proud of the Christian name, mindful of the glorious tradition of the apostolic time when "the multitude of believers had but one heart and one soul." But let all those also loyally and heartily concur who still believe in God and adore Him, in order to ward off from mankind the great danger that threatens all alike. For, in truth, belief in God is the unshaken foundation of all social order and of all responsible action on earth; and, therefore, all those who do not want anarchy and terrorism ought to bestir themselves with a will in order that the enemies of religion may not attain the goal they have so loudly proclaimed to the world.

ALL LAWFUL MEANS MUST BE USED

We are aware, venerable brethren, that in this battle for the defense of religion we must make use of all lawful means at our disposal. Therefore, following in the wise path of our predecessor, Leo XIII, of saintly memory, in our encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, we advocated so energetically a more equitable distribution of the goods of the earth and indicated the most efficacious means of restoring health and strength to the ailing social body, and tranquillity and peace to its suffering members.

For the unquenchable aspiration to reach a suitable state of happiness even on earth is planted in the heart of man by the creator of all things, and Christianity has always recognized and ardently promoted every just effort of true culture and sound progress for the perfecting and developing of mankind.

However, in the face of this satanic hatred of religion, which reminds us of the "mystery of iniquity," referred to by St. Paul, mere human means and expedients are not enough, and we should consider ourselves wanting in our apostolic ministry if we did not point out to mankind those wonderful mysteries of light that alone contain the hidden strength to subjugate the unchained powers of darkness.

When our Lord, coming down from the splendors of Thabor, had healed the boy tormented by the Devil, whom the disciples had not been able to cure, to their humble question, "Why could not we cast him out?" He made reply in the memorable words: "This kind is not cast out but by prayer and fasting."

It appears to us, venerable brethren, that these divine words find a peculiar application in the evils of our times, that can be averted only by means of prayer and penance.

Mindful, then, of our condition, that we are essentially limited and absolutely dependent on the Supreme Being, before everything else let us have recourse to prayer. We know through faith how great is the power of humble, trustful, persevering prayer; and to no other pious work have ever been attached such ample, such universal, such solemn promises as to prayer:

"Ask and it shall be given you, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you. For every one that asketh, receiveth, and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Amen, amen. I say to you if you ask the Father anything in my name He will give it to you."

ACT OF PRAYER UNITES MAN WITH GOD

And what object could be more worthy of our prayer and more in keeping with the adorable person of Him who is the only "mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ," that to beseech Him to preserve on earth faith in one God, living and true? Such prayer bears already in itself a part of its answer; for in the very act of prayer a man unites himself with God and, so to speak, keeps alive on earth the idea of God. The man who prays, merely by his humble posture professes before the world his faith in the Creator and Lord of all things; joined with others in prayer he recognizes that not only the individual but human society as a whole has over it a supreme and absolute Lord.

What a spectacle for heaven and earth is not the church in prayer! For centuries without interruption, from midnight to midnight, is repeated on earth the divine psalmody of the inspired canticles; there is no hour of the day that is not hallowed by its special liturgy; there is no stage of life, great or small, that has not its part in the thanksgiving, praise, supplication, and reparation of the common prayer of the mystical body of Christ, which is the church.

Thus prayer of itself assures the presence of God among men, according to the promise of the Divine Redeemer: "Where there are two or three gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

In addition, prayer will remove the fundamental cause of present-day difficulties which we have mentioned above; that is, the insatiable greed for earthly goods.

The man who prays looks above to the goods of heaven whereon he meditates and which he desires; his whole being is plunged in the contemplation of the marvelous order established by God, which knows not the frenzy of success and does not lose itself in futile competitions of ever-increasing speed; and thus automatically, as it were, will be reestablished that equilibrium between work and rest, whose entire absence from society to-day is responsible for grave dangers to life, physical, economic, and moral.

If, therefore, those who through the excessive production of manufactured articles have fallen into unemployment and poverty made up their minds to give the proper time to prayer, there is no doubt that work and production would soon return to reasonable limits and that the conflict which now divides humanity into two great camps struggling for transient interests would be changed into a noble and peaceful contest for goods heavenly and eternal.

In like manner will the way be opened to the peace we long for, as St. Paul beautifully remarks in the passage where he joins the precept of prayer to holy desires for the peace and salvation of all men:

"I desire, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions and thanksgivings be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high station, that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life in all piety and chastity. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of truth."

ASKS PEACE FOR ALL BE IMPLORED

Let peace be implored for all men, but especially for those who in human society have the grave responsibilities of government; for how could they give peace to their peoples if they have it not themselves? And it is prayer precisely that, according to the apostle, will bring the gift of peace; prayer that is addressed to the Heavenly Father, who is the Father of all men; prayer that is the common expression of family feelings, of that great family which extends beyond the boundaries of any country and continent.

Men who in every nation pray to the same God for peace on earth can not be at the same time bearers of discord among peoples; men who turn in prayer to the Divine Majesty can not foment that nationalistic imperialism which of each people makes its own god; men who look to the "God of Peace and of Love," who turn to Him through the mediation of Christ, who is "our peace," will know no rest until finally that peace which the world can not give comes down from the Giver of every good gift on "men of good will."

"Peace be to you" was the Easter greeting of our Lord to His apostles and first disciples; and this blessed greeting from those first times until our day has never been absent from the sacred liturgy of the church, and to-day more than ever it should comfort and refresh aching and oppressed human hearts.

Chapter III

NEED FOR PENANCE

But to prayer we must also join penance, the spirit of penance, and the practice of Christian penance. Thus our Divine Master teaches us, whose first preaching was precisely penance: "Jesus began to preach and to say, do penance." The same is the teaching of all Christian tradition, of the whole history of the church.

In the great calamities, in the great tribulations of Christianity, when the need of God's help was most pressing, the faithful, either spontaneously or more often following the lead and exhortations of their holy pastors, have always taken in hand the two most mighty weapons of spiritual life—prayer and penance.

By that sacred instinct, by which, unconsciously as it were, the Christian people is guided when not led astray by the sowers of tares, and which is none other than that "mind of Christ" of which the apostle speaks, the faithful have always felt immediately in such cases the need of purifying their souls from sin with contrition of heart, with the sacrament of reconciliation, and of appeasing divine justice with external works of penance as well.

Certainly we know, and with you, venerable brethren, we deplore the fact that in our day the idea and the name of expiation and penance have with many lost in great part the power of rousing enthusiasm of heart and heroism of sacrifice.

In other times they were able to inspire such feelings, for they appeared in the eyes of men of faith as sealed with a divine mark in likeness of Christ and His saints. But nowadays there are some who would put aside external mortifications as things of the past without mentioning the modern "autonomous man," who despises penance as bearing the mark of servitude.

As a fact, the notion of the need of penance and expiation is lost in proportion as belief in God is weakened and the idea of an original sin and of a first rebellion of man against God becomes confused and disappears.

UPHOLDING IDEAS A DUTY OF PASTORAL OFFICE

But we, on the other hand, venerable brethren, have the duty of the pastoral office of bearing aloft these names and ideas and of preserving them in their true meaning, in their genuine dignity, and still more in their practical and necessary application to Christian life. To this we are urged by the very defense of God and religion, which we sustain, since penance is of its nature a recognition and reestablishment of the moral order in the world that is founded on the eternal law that is of the living God.

He who makes satisfaction to God for sin recognizes thereby the sanctity of the highest principles of morality, their internal binding power, the need of a sanction against their violation.

Certainly one of the most dangerous errors of our age is the claim to separate morality from religion, thus removing all solid basis for any legislation. This intellectual error might, perhaps, have passed unnoticed and appeared less dangerous when it was confined to a few and belief in God was still the common heritage of mankind and was tacitly presumed even in the case of those who no longer professed it openly. But to-day, when atheism is spreading through the masses of the people, the practical consequences of such an error become dreadfully tangible, and realities of the saddest kind make their appearance in the world.

In place of moral laws which disappear together with the loss of faith in God, brute force is imposed, trampling on every right. The old-time fidelity and honesty of conduct and mutual intercourse extolled so much even by the orators and poets of paganism now give place to speculations in one's own affairs as in those of others without reference to conscience.

In fact, how can any contract be maintained and what value can any treaty have in which every guarantee of conscience is lacking? And how can there be talk of guarantees of conscience when all faith in God and all fear of God has vanished?

Take away this basis and with it all moral law falls and there is no remedy left to stop the gradual but inevitable destruction of peoples, families, the state—civilization itself.

Penance, then, is, as it were, a salutary weapon placed in the hands of the valiant soldiers of Christ who wish to fight for the defense and restoration of the moral order in the universe. It is a weapon that strikes right at the root of all evil, that is, at the dust of material wealth and the wanton pleasures of life.

By means of voluntary sacrifices, by means of practical and even painful acts of self-denial, by means of various works of penance, the noble-hearted Christian subdues the base passions that tend to make him violate the moral order. But if zeal for divine law and brotherly love are as great in him as they should be, then not only does he practice penance for himself and his own sins but he takes upon himself the expiation of the sins of whole generations, imitating even the Divine Redeemer, who became the Lamb of God "who taketh away the sins of the world."

Is there not, perchance, venerable brethren, in this spirit of penance also a sweet mystery of peace? "There is no peace to the wicked," says the Holy Spirit, because they live in continuous struggle and conflict with the order established by nature and by its creator.

DECLARES MORAL LAW MUST TRIUMPH

Only when this order is restored, when all peoples faithfully and spontaneously recognize and profess it, when the internal conditions of peoples and their outward relations with other nations are founded on this basis—then only will stable peace be possible on earth. But to create this atmosphere of lasting peace neither peace treaties nor the most solemn pacts nor international meetings nor conferences, not even the noblest and most disinterested efforts of any statesman, will be enough unless in the first place are recognized the sacred rights of natural and divine law. No leader in public economy, no power of organization, will even be able to bring social conditions to a peaceful solution unless first in the very field of economics there triumphs moral law based on God and conscience.

This is the underlying value of every value in the political life as well as in the economic life of nations; this is the soundest "rate of exchange." If it is kept steady, all the rest will be stable, being guaranteed by the immutable and eternal law of God.

And even for men individually penance is the foundation and bearer of true peace, detaching them from earthly and perishable goods, lifting them up to goods that are eternal, giving them, even in the midst of privations and adversity, a peace that the world with all its wealth and pleasures can not give.

One of the most pleasing and joyous songs ever heard in this vale of tears is without doubt the famous Canticle of the Sun, of St. Francis. Now, the man who composed it, who wrote and sang it, was one of the greatest penitents, the poor man of Assisi, who possessed absolutely nothing on earth and bore in his emaciated body the painful stigmata of his crucified Lord.

Prayer, then, and penance are the two potent inspirations sent to us at this time by God, that we may lead back to Him mankind that has gone astray and wanders about without a guide. They are the inspirations that will dispel and remedy the first and principal cause of every revolt and every revolution—the revolt of man against God.

But the peoples themselves are called upon to make up their minds to a definite choice: Either they intrust themselves to these benevolent and beneficent inspirations and are converted, humble and repentant, to the Lord and the Father of Mercies, or they abandon themselves and what little remains of happiness on earth to the mercy of the enemy of God, to the spirit of vengeance and destruction.

Nothing remains for us, therefore, save to invite this poor world that has shed so much blood, has dug so many graves, has destroyed so many works, has deprived so many men of bread and labor, nothing else remains for us, we say, but to invite it in the loving words of the sacred liturgy: "Be thou converted to the Lord thy God."

Chapter IV

PERIOD OF PENANCE

What more suitable occasion can we point out to you, venerable brethren, for such a union of prayer and reparation than the approaching Feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus? The proper spirit of this solemnity, as we amply showed four years ago in our encyclical letter Miserentissimum, is the spirit of loving reparation and therefore it was our will that on that day every year in perpetuity there should be made in all the churches of the world a public act of reparation for all the offenses that wound that divine heart.

Let, therefore, this year, the Feast of the Sacred Heart be for the whole church one of holy rivalry of reparation and supplication. Let the faithful hasten in large numbers to the eucharistic board, hasten to the foot of the altar to adore the Redeemer of the world, under the veils of the sacrament, that you, venerable brethren, will have solemnly exposed that day in all the churches.

Let them pour out to that merciful heart that has known all the griefs of the human heart the fullness of their sorrow, the steadfastness of their faith, the trust of their hope, the ardor of their charity. Let them pray to Him, interposing likewise the powerful patronage of the Blessed Virgin Mary, mediatrix of all graces, for themselves and for their families, for their country, for the church. Let them pray to Him for the Vicar of Christ on earth and for all the other pastors who share with him the dread burden of the spiritual government of souls. Let them pray for their brethren who believe, for their brethren who err, for believers, for infidels, even for the enemies of God and the church, that they may be converted, and let them pray for the whole of poor mankind.

Let the spirit of prayer and reparation be maintained with keen earnestness and intensity by all the faithful during the entire octave, to which dignity we have determined to raise this feast; and during this octave, in the manner that each of you, venerable brethren, according to local circumstances, shall think opportune to prescribe or counsel, let there be public prayers and other devout exercises of piety for the intentions we have briefly touched on above, "that we may obtain mercy and find grace in seasonable aid."

May this be indeed for the whole Christian people an octave of reparation and of holy sadness; let these be days of mortification and of prayer. Let the faithful abstain at least from entertainments and amusements, however lawful; let those who are in easier circumstances deduct also something voluntarily, in the spirit of Christian austerity, from the moderate measure of their usual manner of life, bestowing rather on the poor the proceeds of this retrenchment, since almsgiving is also an excellent means of satisfying divine justice and drawing down divine mercies.

And let the poor, and all those who at this time are facing the hard trial of want of work and scarcity of food, let them in a like spirit of penance suffer with greater resignation the privations imposed on them by these hard times and the state of society, which Divine Providence in an inscrutable but ever-loving plan has assigned them. Let them accept with a humble and trustful heart from the hand of God the effects of poverty, rendered harder by the distress in which mankind is now struggling. Let them rise more generously even to the divine sublimity of the cross of Christ, reflecting on the fact that if work is among the greatest values of life, it was nevertheless love of a suffering God that saved the world. Let them take comfort in the certainty that their sacrifices and their troubles borne in a Christian spirit will concur efficaciously to hasten the hour of mercy and peace.

The divine heart of Jesus can not but be moved by the prayers and sacrifices of His church and He will finally say to His spouse, weeping at his feet under the weight of so many griefs and woes, "Great is thy faith; be it done to thee as thou wilt."

With this confidence, strengthened by the memory of the cross, sacred symbol and precious instrument of our holy redemption, the glorious invention of which we celebrate to-day, to you, venerable brethren, to your clergy and people, to the whole Catholic world, we impart with paternal love the apostolic benediction.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, on the Feast of the Invention of the Holy Cross, the 3d of May, in the year of 1932, the eleventh of our pontificate.

PIUS PP. XI.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think it will be generally conceded by the Members of the Senate that I have not been one to delay the expeditious consideration of the pending tax bill. Even with an amendment which I thought would raise half as much as the tax bill itself is estimated to raise, less than a day was consumed. It is therefore with real reluctance that I am forced to take a part in the discussion of the tariff items which I had rather have seen eliminated from this bill, due to their highly controversial nature. But this is a democracy, and many people have appealed to me for tariffs. Only two days ago a group of men interested in wood pulp came to my office and begged me to aid them in securing a tariff on pulpwood. They stated that their business would be ruined unless they could receive the consideration of Congress at this time. I attempted to explain, in my humble way, the dire necessity of balancing the Budget, not so much because, perhaps, it was needed, but because the country had been "sold" upon that idea, and if we did not do it a lack of confidence would ensue.

Mr. President, if we are going to impose tariff duties in this bill, why pick out oil, copper, coal, and lumber? There are thousands of men who are crying for tariff protection. Let us give them all an opportunity. If we are going to have a tariff bill, why not let each one of these men, poor and small though the industry in which he is engaged may be as compared with the giant oil companies, have his day in court? Why should we limit this legislation to tariffs on oil, copper, lumber, and coal? Therefore, in the interest of those who want some change in the tariff law, I have on my desk 500 amendments, which I will offer with the greatest reluctance. I will be glad to withdraw these amendments; I will be delighted not to present them for consideration if other Senators will meet me upon that plane; but if they insist upon having the kind of tariffs to fit their own needs, why should I withhold from the people of my State consideration for their needs?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's experience has been similar to mine and, I presume, similar to that of all other Senators. I have hundreds of letters asking either for a decrease or an increase in some specific tariff rate.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose that we enter upon the consideration of tariff schedules, would not the Senator feel in honor bound to his constituents, if others are to have tariff items in which they are interested considered, to bring those items in which his constituents are interested to the floor of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I would. I have been writing my correspondents for months, ever since the question arose in the House, that I was not in favor of revising the tariff on this bill; that I did not think it was a proper thing to do; that, while technically it would be in order, I realized that if we started on a revision of the tariff we had months ahead of us; that I did not want to interfere with the procedure; and I declined to do it.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator, out of his riper experience, whether, if we should adopt some of these tariff items, as the vote very soon perhaps will show, he does not believe that many other Senators who have been quiescent on tariff matters will then arise and offer other amendments?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly; and I think it would be their duty to do so, and there would not be 500 amendments but the number would run into the thousands. As I look at it, if we are going to revise the tariff, in justice to our own constituents and the country we ought to give every person or corporation affected by a tariff an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I express the thought in the minds of Senators who agree with the Senator from Nebraska when I say that we do not want these tariff matters considered now.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to introduce these amendments now; I do not want to ask for their consideration; but if other Senators say, "We are going into the tariff matters," I can not sit by while men come to my office with tears in their eyes and say they are facing bankruptcy unless, for example, we put a tariff on wood pulp. Gentlemen interested in paper mills at Elkton, Md., and groups of constituents from Charles County and St. Marys County, where the cutting of wood as an industry goes back for centuries, and is one of the most important industries of that section, came to my office the other day and went away discouraged and somewhat displeased with me because I told them that I could not offer the amendment they desired at this time; but if we are going to have tariff items to take care of certain sections of the country, let us have others to take care of the entire country.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, the Senator is strongly against a tariff on oil at any time.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not say what I would do if there were brought in a tariff bill so that the whole picture of the tariff might be before the Senate. I will not commit myself.

Mr. LONG. Did not the Senator vote against the oil tariff when it was up before the Senate a couple of years ago?

Mr. TYDINGS. I did.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield farther?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senate, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Louisiana, that when we had a tariff bill up we fought out the tariff on oil; we fought out the tariff on lumber and on coal. They all had their day in court. It was the same with a good many other commodities, some of which went in the tariff bill at rates that seemed to me to be outrageously high. Those interested in having lower rates can come in and say, with the same logic, it seems to me, "We were beaten in the tariff fight before; we did not want the tariff so high; but we insist that you make the fight now to reduce the tariff on this article as well as to raise it on other articles."

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, I apprehend that some of the strongest advocates of the tariff on oil are going to welcome these amendments because many of them deal with reductions. Some of the tariff advocates for oil spoke very vehemently against the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill as taxing people unjustly, and, therefore, why should they not welcome an opportunity to take from the backs of their people this unfair and overwhelming burden? So long as we are going into tariff matters, I look for support from some of those who advocated a tariff on oil to get the tariff on other commodities reduced; for instance, the duty on aluminum. I will not call any names, but I could call the names of several who advocated a tariff on oil who are very much opposed to a tariff on aluminum. The first amendment I intend to offer is for a reduction of the aluminum tariff, because no aluminum is being imported; the Treasury is not getting any revenue from aluminum at all, but if Congress would reduce the tariff on aluminum slightly, the Treasury would get some revenue from it. This is a revenue measure. The duty on aluminum constitutes an embargo now and many of those who previously voted against the aluminum tariff I know would welcome an opportunity, notwithstanding they are for a tariff on oil, to help me get this amendment adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand the Senator's position to be that if any tariff items are incorporated in the Senate bill he proposes to press each of the amendments he has?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That he proposes to debate them and have roll calls on them?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. And does not the Senator think my position is fair, when I say that I am willing to withdraw all these tariff amendments if others will do likewise? I ask no more for myself than I am ready to concede to others, and I only ask from others what they ask for themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator ought to admit that in such circumstances there is a possibility of no action being taken in the immediate future on the revenue bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. No one regrets that more sincerely than I do. I offered a resolution four or five weeks ago to instruct the Finance Committee to strike all tariff matters from the revenue bill, realizing that this very thing was going to happen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator conferred with the proponents of the tariff items in the hope of getting them to withdraw these amendments?

Mr. TYDINGS. No, I have not; but I have been hoping they would see the great need of withdrawing them and speeding the passage of the tax bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator will not press his amendments until we have had a vote in the Senate upon the items in the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am rather inclined to press them, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, because I rather apprehend that Senators are going to fight for these tariff items, and I want the people of Maryland to have their day in court, too. I think my constituents who are interested in wood pulp are just as much entitled to a hearing here and to protection for the commodity they produce, if they can make out a case as they see it, as any other group or the entire country is entitled to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I hope the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion in reply to the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. His suggestion was that the question of a tariff on oil was fought out in connection with the so-called Smoot-Hawley bill. At that time we had no data upon which to base arguments that were acceptable. Every statement made was denied; and the denial came because of the fact that we had no official information upon which we could base a statement.

At this time we are in a different position. We have two reports from the Tariff Commission, and each report finds a differential between the cost of producing oil abroad and at home of more than $1 per barrel. If there is any virtue whatever in the scientific making of tariffs, we now have the groundwork upon which to apply a rate based upon science.

It is admitted now, and must be admitted, that the facts as set forth in these two reports are correct. The question is whether or not we desire to apply the scientific principles of tariff making to facts that are established; and, having these facts, we are only asserting that we are in good conscience entitled to have the consideration of the Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is a great deal in what the Senator from Oklahoma says; and may I say that that argument applies to a great many other things that have not been offered for consideration.

Moreover, there is already going on before the Committee on Ways and Means a hearing for the purpose of looking over the whole tariff subject to find out what the depreciation in world currency has to do with imports and exports; and before we conclude this debate many facts will be brought out which will cause even other amendments to be offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senate has passed a resolution right on that point, calling on the Tariff Commission for a report to ascertain what effect the going off of the gold standard of some of the leading nations of the world has had on our tariff schedules.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. On that point I should like to call the attention of the Senator to an item that he has already mentioned.

The Senator from Oklahoma says we have information now that we formerly did not have. I think that is true; but take aluminum, which the Senator has mentioned. We have now had—I may be mistaken, but I think I am right—the experience of the operation for quite a while of the tariff on aluminum that is in the present law; and the effect of it has been to keep aluminum out of the country. It is a practical embargo, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is not producing any revenue at all.

Mr. NORRIS. We did not know that when we passed the bill. We have passed it, however; and the operation of the bill has disclosed that, instead of raising revenue, instead of furnishing some competition for the Aluminum Trust in the United States, we have strengthened them in their stronghold. The same argument would apply now to taking up a tariff discussion on that question, and it is true of a lot of other things.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is fair to say that the act of 1930 did not increase the tariff on aluminum. The fight that was made in the Senate was to reduce it. I offered an amendment to reduce the tariff on aluminum, and the Senator from Montana offered an amendment to reduce the tariff on another type of aluminum, which was carried on the floor of the Senate, but was defeated in conference. The rates on aluminum in the present law are the same rates that have been in effect since 1922, so that whatever has happened to aluminum can not be charged to the present act any more than to the act of 1922.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not say that; but it can be charged to existing law.

Mr. BARKLEY. That may be.

Mr. NORRIS. And what I think we ought to do, if we are going into the tariff subject, is to correct that tariff.

Mr. TYDINGS. For revenue purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Well enough.

I hope those who may be listening will regard with some earnestness what I am now about to say.

I do not want to offer these amendments. I do not want to delay the passage of this bill. I am ready to vote to strike out every tariff item in the bill and pass it before the end of this week, if we can conclude on other matters; but if there is to be a tariff bill, the people of my State are going to have their say, the same as the people of every other State in the Union.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. Has consideration ever been given to the feasibility of preparing an emergency tariff bill that might include these four items for a limited period of time, as we dealt with agriculture in 1921?

I am inclined to take the position the Senator from Maryland takes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator would.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to make a tariff bill out of a tax bill, and yet I have pronounced sympathy for what these people are trying to do. I voted for the tariff on oil, I think, five times. I think the copper situation is quite obvious, and I should like to be put in a position where I can give it such support as these people are asking. I think it is due them. It does seem to me, however, that we are really going into untried fields when we start out to protect an article under the head of raising revenue, and are opening up the tax bill to interminable debate.

In response to the applications of many different people in Ohio, including those engaged in producing matches, jute, crockery, and other things, I have said that we do not want to insert tariff items in the bill. If we do, it seems to me that I should have to take the same position that the Senator from Maryland does, and that I could not deny to these people their right to be heard upon the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator from Ohio has brought out that point. I do not want to deny these gentlemen the right to have a bill come in here dealing with the tariff, and to have their case considered. I do not say that that should not be done; but when we get into tariff matters in connection with this revenue bill, which ought to be passed soon, in my judgment, it is going to bring on a period of delay and debate and amendment, because everybody ought to have the same right to consideration, which will make the thing go away into the summer, with no hope of balancing the Budget.

Mr. FESS. I was wondering whether any thought had been given to the suggestion I made a while ago, that an emergency bill be introduced. I should like to vote for a measure like that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I should look with favor upon that plan.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am pained and astonished. From the lamentations to which we have listened, which out-lament Jeremiah, one would suppose that the advocates of a tariff on oil, copper, lumber, and coal had adopted a censorious attitude and had gone about the Chamber demanding that nothing else be put into this tariff bill.

I respectfully defy the Senator from Maryland to point to a single Senator urging tariff items who has said, "You must not include in this bill anything but our items." Nobody is holding the Senator. He is a free man. He may offer all the amendments he desires. If the bill is bad as the Senator says, because, forsooth, it has tariffs, he is going to make it good by more tariffs. That is his logic. If it be bad because of tariff items, therefore it is to be made better by more tariff items.

If the bill be bad, forsooth, because of the tariff items therein, surely the Senator, unless he outrivals Beau Geste himself, is not going to make it better by doing more of that which he thinks is bad.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that the Senator's logic is sound—and I can not find any fault with it—we can make the bill still better than it is now if the Senator will withdraw his copper amendment, taking his own argument.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I could not in fairness accuse the Senator from Maryland of being remiss in the performance of a duty, because he has a remarkable industry; and when industry coupled with a pungent intellect are found in the same person, that is a pretty good Senator, and that describes the Senator from Maryland. The proponents of these tariff items went to the Tariff Commission. The Senator from Maryland has not gone to the Tariff Commission to obtain the report of that body. Let the Senator go to the tribunal provided by law, viz, the Tariff Commission, and if he brings an item to this body regarding which the Tariff Commission asserts that there should be a tariff he will probably find me supporting him, and I shall not be censorious of his able efforts in trying to secure justice for his constituents.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] introduced the appropriate resolution in the last Congress, calling upon the Tariff Commission for a report respecting copper. How many resolutions has the Senator from Maryland passed through the Senate calling upon the Tariff Commission for a report?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator condemns me for what he admits is my own virtue. He first says that I did not offer these amendments to the committee; I did not ask that they be incorporated in the tariff bill. I have "sinned away my day of grace," showing, I thought, my good faith in my own position as taken now; and then he claims that it is a sin, and if I had done it, I would have sinned still more. So he has both sides of the argument on that question, and, of course, it is impossible.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Returning to the Senator's argument for a moment, as I understand it, his argument thus far presented is that this particular item in this kind of a bill is an inappropriate thing; and therefore, because it is a tariff item in a tax bill he opposes it.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I do not contend that. The bill is here; and this proposition has as much right to be here, parliamentarily or otherwise, under the rules of this body, as any other measure has. I concede that. I am simply trying to bring out the point that many of us heretofore have withheld from the bill tariff proposals for which, under ordinary conditions, we would have been inclined to obtain consideration; and inasmuch as we have done that, and the committee has seen fit to put some tariff proposals in the bill, we should be permitted to put in our proposals.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think I follow the Senator, if he will pardon me.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I will.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right. Now let me ask the Senator frankly one question:

If there stood before the Senate to-day a single item of the oil tariff, unconnected with either a tariff bill or the particular measure that we are now considering, with the same ability, the same pertinacity, the same perspicuity, the same emphasis, and exactly in the same manner the Senator from Maryland would oppose that item; would he not?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; and, on the other hand, the Senator from Maryland on many other items would join the Senator from California, so that both of us at some time or other would be in opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am speaking of the one single item now, because I recall that when pending before the Commerce Committee were two bills, one relating to an embargo and the other relating to a tariff on oil, the Senator from Maryland appeared and in his usual emphatic and able fashion argued elaborately and emphatically against any such item under any circumstances.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON. So that the Senator stands here to-day not fighting this particular measure or the other items which are referred to as tariff items because they are tariff items in a tax bill, but because he is against, under any circumstances, an oil tariff at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. I am asking, is not that the fact?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is exactly true, with this additional statement; and will the Senator listen?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I have said over and over again, that is for the plain reason that if we incorporate in the bill this one tariff we are going to have before us a whole tariff bill, which will consume months of debate and call for numerous roll calls, while this tax bill to balance the Budget remains undisposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will permit me, that does not follow at all; and what I am trying to make plain is that the Senator's attitude is one of fundamental opposition to this tariff item. I want to make plain, therefore, by implication, that the threat he makes of 500 tariff items is a threat that the Senator ought not to make under such circumstances.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will give me his attention a moment, as I stated a minute ago, several delegations from my State have been coming to see me for a number of months, and particularly in the last month, to ask me to support a tariff on wood pulp. They brought figures with them. One gentleman told me that if we did not put a tariff on that product he would go into bankruptcy. He brought Senator Mitchell, one of the outstanding Democrats of my State, along with him to support his position, and both of them asked me then to help them to get a tariff on wood pulp now because they needed it, or they would be ruined, as they thought.

Although I think no one will question it, I can produce correspondence which passed subsequent to this conversation, in which I said to these groups that I was opposed to the insertion of any tariff matters in the revenue bill at this time, no matter how just they might be; that if the tariff on wood pulp came up before the Senate, I would give it every consideration, and perhaps might even go so far as to vote for it, but that, notwithstanding this gentleman's great need, the need of balancing the Budget was a higher and a greater need than that, and even though I should be in accord with him on the wood-pulp situation, I would not bring myself to ask the delay of this bill, unless the whole tariff matter was to be brought before the Senate. I concluded that letter with this statement:

> If, however, other tariff items are brought upon the floor for discussion and debate, I feel, as your representative, that I owe it to you to see that you have equal treatment for your particular business to that given to others.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to pardon me, and then I will not continue the interruptions at all.

What the Senator may do rests entirely with him. But the Senator is to-day opposing this item, I want to make clear to the Senate, not upon any theory of this item being in a tax bill——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am opposed to the tariff on oil. I gladly admit that.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is opposing it upon the fundamental idea that he does not want what we assert is this relief accorded at all. And so I think the Senator ought to dismiss from the argument, which doubtless will be sequential, logical, convincing, persuasive, and undoubtedly able—I think he ought to dismiss the idea of a threat of any number of tariff items in this bill. I do not think the Senator would desire to do that in any event, but if he did, that rests with himself. But his opposition here is because he does not want this tariff under any circumstances accorded the oil people.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, and, in addition to that, I do not want to see us pass a tariff bill now, because if we attempt to do that, I know that we will not balance the Budget before the end of the fiscal year.

I want to say just this before leaving this part of the discussion: As I recall my correspondence on the wood-pulp matter, it seems to me that I would be honor bound, although it may be defeated here on the floor, to ask for this constituent, who has made out a very good case, in a rough way, that his item also be considered, and that we have a vote on it, and insert it in the bill if possible.

If I feel that way, I know enough about the times to know that many Senators have received similar letters about other products, and therefore we will be in a debate entirely removed from the revenue bill. We will be writing a tariff bill. Excise taxes and admission taxes will be secondary, tariff will be primary, and the delay, which we can avert now, will last for months.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In view of what the Senator from Arizona stated a few minutes ago, and, in addition, the criticism made that the amendments to be proposed by the Senator from Maryland have not been investigated by the United States Tariff Commission, it ought to be pointed out that an investigation was made by the United States Tariff Commission on the petition of lumber dealers for an increased tariff on lumber, and that in November, 1931, the Tariff Commission reported against the increase, and that in December, 1931, the President approved that report, and no increase was granted.

Mr. TYDINGS. And notwithstanding that, it is in this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yet the majority of the Finance Committee report an increased duty, from $1 to $3 per thousand feet, on lumber.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is an illustration. Here is a matter which the Tariff Commission reported against, but here it is in the bill, even though the President approved the report of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the Senator speaking of the oil tariff?

Mr. TYDINGS. The lumber tariff.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg pardon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with what I have just said I call attention to the statement made by the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission yesterday before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. He stated that in his judgment it would be a great mistake to adjust tariff rates upward against nations with depreciated currencies.

Mr. NORRIS. Who said that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, Mr. Robert L. O'Brien, before the Ways and Means Committee yesterday, and he discussed that very question. When I have the full statement, I desire to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. TYDINGS. Now, Mr. President, I come to the subject of the tariff on oil, leaving the debate which we have just had to a later date.

I oppose the tariff on oil for several reasons. First of all, it will not help the independent producer; it will help the large companies. Secondly, it will increase the cost of gasoline and fuel oil and its by-products. Thirdly, it will throw a number of people out of work who are now employed; and in the last analysis, it will not yield the revenue.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As to the matter of employment, I wish the Senator would explain what he means by saying it will throw a number of people out of work?

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that the tariff is effective—and I think an embargo is desired by many who advocate the tariff—along the Atlantic seaboard there are a number of refineries. In the city of Baltimore between 400 and 1,000 people are employed in converting crude oil into various by-products, asphalt, and so on. Moreover, the ships which bring the oil from South America to Baltimore are owned by Americans, manned by American sailors, and buy products from American producers in Baltimore. So I might carry it on down to the refinery in South America I visualize, which is manned largely by American labor taken down there. So that what a tariff would be supposed to bring about in the way of employment in certain parts of the country, if it were effective, would result in putting the people to whom I have referred out of employment and making their huge investment—an American investment, by the way—valueless.

Let us first of all look at this proposition. The Treasury estimated that a 1-cent per gallon tax on the 16,500,000,000 gallons of gasoline used in the United States would return to the Government $165,000,000. That is a straight-out excise tax.

The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Kansas claim that this tariff would tend to increase the cost of the commodity. So that assuming that the increased cost of the commodity because of the tariff would be equivalent to the tariff, each cent per gallon on imported gasoline would drive up the domestic price of gasoline $165,000,000.

In this bill it is proposed to levy a tariff tax of 2½ cents a gallon. Therefore the additional amount of money which the consumer would pay would be $412,500,000. That is nearly half of all the taxes which we are levying in this tax bill. But the Government would not get this tax. It would go into the coffers of the oil companies. We are not proposing to raise this $412,500,000 for the Treasury. They would get only a mere pittance, a handout, a ham sandwich at a gorgeous banquet. The people who would get that would be the oil companies, who would take advantage of the increased cost of gasoline to take the domestic gasoline up to that point, and thereby to place taxation on the American people in the sum of $412,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what relation has the increased price of crude oil to the gasoline price?

Mr. TYDINGS. Those who advocate the tariff on oil of a half a cent a gallon claim that 2½ cents a gallon on the gasoline is not the proper correlation, that it should be higher. The Senator from Texas made that statement yesterday in the course of his remarks. But I have only taken it at 2½ cents.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say what the Senator has indicated I stated. I said that if crude bears 1 cent, then the gasoline ought to bear a heavier rate, so that we will force the companies to bring in crude and refine it here and get the benefit of employment here, rather than induce them to refine the oil in other fields.

Mr. BORAH. The price of gasoline does not necessarily rise and fall with the price of crude oil, does it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that last summer in Texas when the crude oil was selling at 10 cents a barrel there was no appreciable change whatever in the price of gasoline to the consumer.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will come to that a little later.

Mr. CONNALLY. Gasoline was bringing the same price when crude oil was selling for from 80 cents to $1 a barrel.

Mr. BORAH. But it is also true, is it not, that a tariff would give them some power to control the price of gasoline?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I can clear that up.

Mr. BORAH. It does not necessarily follow, but it would give them the power to bring it about.

Mr. TYDINGS. They own it all. I will finish the statement I was making and then take that matter up.

Not only is what I have said true, but in addition the gasoline consumer would pay, through the proposed increase of 21 cents, on the 348,630,000 barrels of fuel oil imported, $73,212,000, making a total of $586,000,000 which the oil companies would get out of this tariff, not the independent producers but the oil companies, the 20 largest companies, and why? Because the 20 major companies own 51 per cent of all the production in the United States. They own 73 per cent of all the refining capacity in the country. They own 95 per cent—and this is the apex of the triangle—of all the storage facilities in the country, where they can store up oil, create a demand, let it go; depress the price, refuse to buy. They own 90 per cent of all the pipe lines in the country, and they own 85 per cent of the retail distribution in the country.

They have two-thirds of one year's oil supply in the pipe lines at this hour. They can go along for eight months and not buy one single gallon of oil; and no one can deny that statement. They have two-thirds of a year's supply in the pipe lines. No one denies that. Therefore they can use that supply for eight months, and furnish the entire American market with oil, without buying a gallon of oil from any independent producer in the country.

Who is so naïve and simple, in the face of those facts, as to believe that Mr. Independent Producer is going to get a farthing out of this tariff? He has to sell his oil. He holds back as long as he can, but the pressure of his debts is great, and oil is coming out of the ground anyway. It is necessary to get the militia out to enforce curtailment of production. Men will not curtail production, even with the price almost nothing. It is necessary to get the militia out to force them not to produce oil. But even so, the oil company, when the price goes up, says, "Don't buy any for two or three weeks." One man gives way. He can not wait any longer. He starts to sell, but they say, "No; we will not buy." A month goes by, or two or three months go by, and he is unable to sell. The result is that in the end the poor independent oil producer has got to sell at the price these companies set or not sell at all.

If he does not sell to them, can he refine it in his own refinery? Most of the independent oil producers own no refinery. There is no refinery near many of them. They have to sell to the oil companies who store the oil in their own pipe lines. Further than that, if he does not want to sell to them, even if he owns a refinery, how can he distribute it when the big oil companies already own 85 per cent of the retail distribution?

Instead of this being a bill to help the independent producer, owing to the fact that two-thirds of one year's supply of oil is already owned by the large companies, there will be 2½ cents more per gallon of the inventory value added to the product of the big companies. They will be enriched by $1,000,000 just overnight.

Now, let us come to the poor fellow who gets abused so much and whom everybody loves, whom everybody wants to help, for whom Congress has appropriated $500,000,000 in the form of a Federal Farm Board, the fellow whom we think the backbone of the Nation and whom, particularly at election time, we fairly tear our shirts to save from going completely to the dogs—the poor downtrodden farmer. Let us see where he gets off in this era of 687,000 farms sold in two years under mortgage foreclosures and for delinquent taxes. Let us see where we help him. Here is how we help him.

The farming industry is among the foremost of the users of gasoline and oil and a tariff would add to this burden. The farmers in 1930 owned 4,134,675 automobiles, 900,385 motor trucks, 920,395 tractors, and 1,131,108 stationary engines. These figures are taken from the report of the United States Census Bureau. The total gasoline consumed on the farms amounted to 3,809,000,000 gallons, computed from the gasoline tax, 1930, United States Department of Agriculture. An increase of 2½ cents a gallon in the price would amount to more than $95,000,000 a year.

Mr. LONG rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will wait just a moment, I shall be glad to yield. I have gone to some little trouble to get experts to allocate this amount to each State so each Senator may know exactly how much of a burden he is passing on to the farmers of his State. Here is the way it works out.

In Alabama there were 58,130,856 gallons of gasoline consumed on the farms annually. The additional cost to the farmers of that State of an increase of 2.5 cents per gallon would mean $1,453,271. I think the Senators from Alabama would be very glad to help these large oil companies by extracting that amount from the pockets of the farmers of Alabama, who are already rich, who are rolling in wealth, with cotton soaring, with my good friend from Louisiana going all over the South asking them to plow under every third row. I am sure my good friend from Louisiana wants these poor downtrodden farmers of Alabama, who are already asked by him to plant one-third less cotton next year, to make this contribution of almost $1,500,000 to the 20 large oil companies.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish with these figures and then I shall yield to the Senator as long as he wants.

Let us go to Arizona. I remember when the tariff bill was up there were all sorts of tropical things mentioned that are produced in that very beautiful State, so ably represented by the fiery, eloquent, persevering, and forceful senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and his charming friend and companion and able fellow legislator [Mr. HAYDEN]. The farmers of Arizona had no better advocates than these two gentlemen. I know how they fought to be protected from Arabian dates so those poor devils in Arizona would not go to the dogs.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would prefer not to yield now.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to get some information at this point.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. In my State we, of course, produce some oil. The Standard Oil companies have been charging the farmers of my State in the neighborhood of 24 cents a gallon for gasoline, whereas it is being sold in California and other places for 9 cents and up to as high as 13 or 14 cents. They have no tariff upon it at all. They are getting cheap oil in California and producing it in Montana, and refining it in Montana. I know as a matter of fact we have produced it and refined it in my State as low as 8 cents a gallon. Yet the Standard Oil Co. comes there and fixes the price of gasoline at 24 cents for the consuming public, which convinces me as a matter of fact that regardless of whether they have a tariff or do not have a tariff the Standard Oil companies of this country absolutely fix the price of gasoline at whatever they think they can get for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is not only unimpeachable proof of what I have been saying, but eloquent verification of the statement that the independent oil producers will not get a farthing out of this tax.

Mr. WHEELER. Regardless of whether or not we have a tariff the Standard Oil companies have such control of the price of gasoline in this country to-day that I do not agree with the Senator that they will necessarily have to raise the price of gasoline, because I do not think that enters into the question. They are actually fixing the price of gasoline in every community in this country and getting everything the traffic will bear.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that is true.

Mr. WHEELER. About a year ago I introduced a resolution asking that the Department of Justice investigate the oil companies in my State to ascertain whether or not there was violation of the Sherman antitrust law. They came back after making a very cursory investigation and said there was no violation. I submit that as a matter of fact the Standard Oil companies of this country to-day are violating the Sherman antitrust law. They are doing it boldly and brazenly, and notwithstanding the fact they are doing it the Department of Justice does not act. I believe——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield some of my own time to me? I appreciate everything he has said, and it has a great deal of merit, but I want to go on with my presentation and later on I want to yield to my friend from Louisiana. Only a moment ago I denied him the opportunity to ask me a question.

In Arizona there are 10,867,312 gallons of gasoline consumed annually on the farms. That only means that the State is small in population but great in wealth and great in possibilities. The farmers of Arizona pay to the oil companies a tribute of a mere quarter of a million dollars—$271,683 to be exact. I am sure that the Senators from Arizona, knowing the plight of the farmers and knowing they have to have this gasoline, knowing that if the tariff is effective, as it is conceded by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], that it would be, it will tend to increase the price, are going to dislike very much to invite the farmers to make these extra dividends possible for the large oil companies.

In Arkansas the farmers annually consume on the farms 50,800,840 gallons of gasoline annually. The farmers of Arkansas would pay to the oil companies an additional cost of $1,270,021 annually.

Then, in the State of California, where the oil men in their greed want to add to their dividends that they may ride up on the crest of increased prices and pluck the fruits of this tariff legislation, there are 145,395,097 gallons of gasoline used by the farmers annually. It would cost the farmers of California an increase of $3,634,877 over their present bills.

I would like to say, if any Senator wants to know about his State, that if he will be patient I am coming to it. I am going to read the figures as to each of the States.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Do the Senator's data also give the total amount of consumption in each State as well as that which is consumed by the farmers?

Mr. TYDINGS. I put that information in the RECORD last year, but I shall be glad to get it again if the Senator is interested. I am just talking about this man whom we are all going to help, this good chap whom we call the farmer. I want to show how we go out and say, "I voted for the Federal Farm Board, which took $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money; but I do not want you to know that while you were not looking, we reached out and took another $500,000,000 from you which we gave to these large oil companies." In other words, the total cost of this increase will take from the American people for the benefit of the large oil companies the same amount of money that we appropriated to help the farmer. Of course, the Government will not get that extra amount of money. The oil companies will get it.

Now, let us come to Colorado, rather much of a mountain State, but it uses 48,371,448 gallons of gasoline on its farms annually. That means the farmers of that State, by virtue of the levying of this tariff, will pay 1,209,286 more dollars than they would have paid.

Now, we come to Connecticut. We do not think of Connecticut as much of a farming State. We rather think of it as a manufacturing State. But the Department of Agriculture says that the farmers of that State consume 17,193,352 gallons of gasoline annually on the farms. That means that Connecticut farmers would pay $429,834 in additional tribute.

Then we go to little Delaware, rich in truck farming, a regular land of plenty, supplying the markets of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Trenton with strawberries, cantaloupes, and watermelons, trucking them all there, not sending them on the railroads. They have cooperatives over there. They ship lots of those products overnight by truck. The roads are regular beehives of industry. Are the Senators from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. TOWNSEND] going to go back on the good farmers who put them here? Delaware uses 8,890,640 gallons of gasoline a year on its farms, and this proposed tariff would cost the farmers of Delaware $222,266 additional each year.

That is the way the Senators can help the farmers if they really want to help them. Cut these extra expenses off of them. It will be very interesting to see the votes of those who represent the large agricultural communities. The farmers will then know that the men, whoever they may be, who represent the large farming States were not above making the oil companies rich and the masses of the farmers just that much poorer in an era when farm-mortgage foreclosures and delinquent-tax sales are running riot.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator will yield, because I want to leave the Chamber.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. LONG. The Senator seems to be a very rapid calculator and makes his questions and answers them as he goes along to suit himself. I am satisfied the statistics are not all made as the Senator progresses. But I was just wondering if he had a calculation to show how much more the farmers would be paying for gasoline in the respective States if they were paying as much for gasoline in the United States as is being paid in Venezuela, where they produce the oil at $1.03 per barrel less than here?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to take that up in due time, but right now I want to take care of that man we call the farmer, for whom Congress has so much love and esteem.

Mr. LONG. Just one more question, and I will promise not to interrupt for a considerable time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator ask me questions pertaining to things to which I am addressing myself at the time, because many of the matters involved in his questions will be taken up by me in due time?

Mr. LONG. I was going to ask the Senator if he did not know these poor farmers down in my State have nothing to wear but straw hats?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; and if the Senator succeeds in securing a tariff tax on oil, they will not have anything on their heads but God's heaven. [Laughter.]

In the State of Florida the farmers use 32,476,270 gallons of gasoline annually. During the consideration of the tariff bill the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] labored here in the morning, in the afternoon, and in the evening for tariff duties on such things as avacados, as I remember, which I understand are alligator pears, and on nuts and dates; but if a tariff duty shall be placed on oil, the same farmers for whom they fought so valiantly will have an extra annual expense, in addition to what they now pay for their gasoline, of $811,907 annually.

Georgia, a large State, a great farm State, is ably represented here by its senior Senator [Mr. GEORGE] and his new compatriot, the junior Senator [Mr. COHEN]. The senior Senator from Georgia was one of the outspoken opponents of the tariff. Let me tell him that in his State the farmers use 74,311,338 gallons of gasoline annually; and if the tax on oil shall go through, the farmers of Georgia will have an increased expense over that now existing of $1,857,806 a year in the form of tribute to the 20 large oil companies.

Idaho uses annually 25,686,179 gallons of gasoline on its farms. The proposed tax on oil, if adopted, will mean that the farmers of Idaho will pay $642,154 more for their gasoline than they now pay. The junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] is a friend of the farmers; he has made several fights here in their behalf; and I can not imagine that at this time he is going to go back on his long train of effort and place a burden on the farmers of his State of $642,154 a year. Without knowing where the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stands, I can not imagine him embracing any such philosophy as is contained in the pending tariff proposal.

In Illinois 210,842,996 gallons of gasoline are consumed annually on its farms. So, if this proposed tax shall go through, it will mean an increased cost to the farmers of Illinois of $5,271,075. Certainly the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], who is up for reelection this year, aside from the merit or demerit of the case, even if the proposed tariff is sound, would hesitate to go before the farmers of Illinois knowing that their expenses had been increased $5,000,000 a year. I would not want to do it.

Indiana is ably represented by the Republican leader, my good friend the senior Senator from that State [Mr. WATSON] and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. May I say to the Republican leader that in Indiana there are 135,587,870 gallons of gasoline consumed by the farmers alone each year. So, if this tariff of 2½ cents shall be imposed on oil, it will mean an extra cost on gasoline that the farmers in the State of the Republican leader of the United States Senate will be forced to pay of $3,389,697 a year. I believe that if a postal card addressed to the farmers of Indiana on this question could be sent to them all, there would be about 101 per cent of replies saying "We ask our senior Senator not to vote for this tariff tax"; and I do not believe the Senator will vote for it, because he knows these tariffs have no place here now and they are delaying the passage of the tax bill. However, I simply mention that in passing.

Iowa, in part, is represented by my friend the senior Senator from that State [Mr. BROOKHART], who has probably made more speeches in behalf of the farmers than most of the newer Senators, at any rate. The farmers of Iowa use each year 216,122,393 gallons of gasoline. The farmers of Iowa, of course, are prosperous; there has been no short price for crops there; there have been no mortgage foreclosures or tax sales. It has been stated that about 600 Iowa banks have failed, but, of course, that can not be blamed on the farmers. Anyway, if this new tariff bill goes through, as at present framed, the farmers of Iowa will contribute the huge sum of $5,403,060 more than they are now paying for the gasoline they use on their farms.

Kansas is ably represented by its senior Senator [Mr. CAPPER], who publishes numerous farm journals, and by the new junior Senator [Mr. MCGILL], both of whom are friends of the farmer. A farm relief bill can not be proposed that each of them will not go into panegyrics and ecstacies about what should be done. I can not imagine that these Senators, knowing that the farmers of Kansas use 166,521,226 gallons of gasoline annually, are going to place an additional tax of $4,163,031 on the farmers of that State.

Kentucky: The farmers of Kentucky use 54,993,000 gallons of gasoline annually. If a tariff shall be imposed on oil their increased bill for gasoline will be $1,374,839. I remember the eloquent remarks of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] against a tariff on oil, when the present tariff law was under consideration, and I commended the straightforward way in which he said that, notwithstanding there were oil interests in his State, he would not put this additional burden on the consumer. I can not imagine now that the other Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who has already demonstrated his great ability and his patriotism by many fine speeches he has made in the Senate, will feel inclined to vote this new burden upon the farmers of Kentucky.

Louisiana: The leader in the oil-tariff fight has the honor to represent the State of Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I did not know that the Senator from Maryland had the right to nominate and elect leaders.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sure, whether the Senator from Louisiana is the titular head or the actual head, everybody here recognizes that he is the spearhead of this battle to obtain an oil tariff. I do not say that as any reflection on him. He is representing what he believes to be the best interest of his State.

However, in Louisiana 39,702,373 gallons of gasoline are used by the farmers every year, and if this tax should be adopted it will cost them nearly a million dollars extra each year. To be exact, it will cost them $992,559 more than they are paying now. The Government will not get the extra amount which they will be required to pay, but the large oil companies will take every cent of it.

Of course I think the Senator from Louisiana wants to represent both the oil interests and the farm interests, as I would want to do if I came from his State, but I am rather at a loss to know how he is going to carry oil on one shoulder and the farmer's empty grain sack on the other in a fight like this, because if he puts the burden of an oil tariff on one shoulder he will lessen the value of the grain sack on the other, for the operating and production expenses of the man who uses the grain sack will be increased.

In Maine the farmers use 26,152,216 gallons of gasoline annually. The figures include no one else but the farmers. So a tariff on oil will mean that the farmers of Maine will pay $653,805 more each year than they are paying now for their gasoline alone.

Maryland: Why pass over that little State? It uses on its farms 35,523,608 gallons of gasoline annually.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, why does the Senator treat Maryland different from the way in which he treats the other States? Why does not the Senator, before he tells us about the gasoline used by the farmers of Maryland, deliver a eulogy on the Senators from Maryland?

Mr. TYDINGS. I was somewhat at a loss to do that, but I rather think that might be appropriate if I were immodest enough to do it, in view of the position I have taken against this outrageous proposition which is pending before the Senate.

The reason I refer to Maryland as a "little State" is because it is very difficult for a small State, no matter how meritorious the claim of one of its citizens might be in a larger sphere, to receive recognition, for the Presidency, for example—and I say this with no one particularly in mind—such as would be accorded to a citizen of Ohio or New York or Massachusetts or Illinois. The same statement applies to the citizens of Western States. A man who lives in New York or Ohio might readily be nominated for the Presidency, whereas, if the same man lived in Nebraska, it would be very difficult for him to secure the nomination. So that I referred to my State as I did, not by way of belittling it, but simply to show its unfair position in the scheme of things, political psychology being what it is.

However, the farmers of my State would pay $888,000 more for the gasoline they use on their farms than they are now paying.

In Massachusetts the farmers use 21,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually, and the adoption of this proposed tax on oil would cost the farmers of that State $545,000 additional a year.

Michigan is represented by the senior Senator from that State [Mr. COUZENS], who has had a very prominent part in the tax fight here, and by the junior Senator [Mr. VANDENBERG], who, with his colleague, is battling, standing here day after day, to keep the crushing excise tax off the automobile industry. I honor them and respect them for representing their State so well; but may I say to them that in that State the farmers use 148,455,000 gallons of gasoline annually, so that the tax on oil would mean that the farmers of Michigan would henceforth pay, in addition to the price they are now paying for their gasoline, the sum of $3,711,371 annually.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator reach his figures by multiplying the total consumption by the total proposed tariff? Is that the process by which he reaches his figures?

Mr. TYDINGS. I multiply the tariff rate by the number of gallons consumed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I say to the Senator I think his figures will not scare any Michigan farmer, because those farmers listened to precisely the same type of argument on the part of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. TYDINGS. They will not scare me, but they may scare the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They listened to the same kind of argument presented by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in connection with the sugar tariff; but instead of having the net result of adding the tariff to their price of sugar, they now find sugar selling at the lowest price in history.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. We find farm products selling at even a lower price than we have known for decades.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN in the Chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. From what source did the Senator find the amount of gasoline that the farmers use?

Mr. TYDINGS. These figures are computed from the gasoline taxes of 1930 by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the gasoline used by the farmers separated from all other gasoline?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. The Senator may not know it, but practically every State in the Union exempts the farmer's gasoline from paying tax. Therefore it is not difficult to compute it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not discussing the question of a tax at all. I simply wanted to know how the Senator arrived at these figures. I asked one of the officials of the Government here just a few moments ago and he does not know.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me jump to Utah over these other States and see how it affects that State.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator need not jump over to Utah. We know just exactly what this 2½ cents will amount to.

Mr. TYDINGS. In the State of Utah the farmers use 12,961,701 gallons of gasoline annually on their farms. That means that the farmers of the State of Utah would pay, in addition to the normal expenses which they are now paying, $324,000 a year, which would not come to the Government but which would go to the oil companies. I am sure the Senator from Utah can see no objection to taxing the farmers of his State three hundred or more thousand dollars a year for the benefit of these poor oil companies. As the Senator knows, Rockefeller needs this money, and the Senator's farmers do not need it; and he should take care of men like that, even though they live in New York. Under no circumstances should the farmers of Utah be prevented from contributing to the wealth of a poor man like John D. Rockefeller. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, again I ask the Senator how those figures can be justified, when in the State of Utah I have seen gasoline sell for 16 or 17 cents a gallon, and within a week it was selling at 9 cents?

Mr. TYDINGS. The record here of the Senator from Utah is so long and his service to his State has perhaps been so satisfactory that I doubt if any man could defeat him in Utah; but may I say, with all due respect, that if it were possible to assemble in the Senate Chamber every farmer in the State of Utah and explain this situation to them, the Senator would not have a ghost of a show for being reelected if he voted for this tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I am not at all worried about reelection, Mr. President. That is not what I am thinking about.

Mr. TYDINGS. I say that in spite of the hard work the Senator has done here and the esteem in which his colleagues hold him.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not thinking about reelection, and I do not vote with a view to reelection. I simply asked the question of the Senator. I am not saying what power regulates the price of gasoline, but I know that overnight, many times, there is a difference of almost 50 per cent in the price which the farmer pays for gasoline.

Mr. TYDINGS. That proves it exactly. That is what the large oil companies do.

Suppose the Senator from Utah raised apples, and I controlled the storage of 95 per cent of all the apples in the world, and I had three-quarters of a year's supply of apples in my apple-storage plant, and I owned 85 per cent of all the distributing centers at which apples were sold. I could tell the Senator, "If you do not want to sell your apples to me, sell them where you can." The Senator would own no distributing stations; he would have no storage facilities, and he would have to sell his apples in competition with mine at whatever price I fixed, or let his apples rot.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If this amendment will be of such vast benefit to Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Mellon and the Dutch Shell Co., why are they fighting it so viciously?

Mr. TYDINGS. Why are they fighting it? I have not seen any of them fighting it. None of them have been to see me. I have not had a letter from them. All the fighting I have seen done here has been done by Mr. Wirt Franklin, Mr. Bascom Slemp, and Mr. Hitchcock, a former Postmaster General, who, in their usual affable manner, have gone among Senators, hanging up their hats in the Capitol here, buttonholing Senators as they appear through the doors. If those who have been talking about a "locust swarm of lobbyists" want to have some of the king-pin lobbyists taken out of that swarm, I have mentioned where those gentlemen can be found. They are out there now.

Is Rockefeller out there? Who is out there against an oil tariff? Nobody has seen me on the subject, but I tell you those gentlemen are there, and if we could get back to where their inspiration comes from I would not be surprised if the Standard Oil Co. should be seen approaching the Capitol through that liaison of three men.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say he is so innocent that he does not know that the Standard Oil Co. has fought this tariff for 20 years?

Mr. TYDINGS. Neither the Standard Oil Co. nor any of its representatives, so far as I know, have ever talked to me or have ever sent a communication to me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator explain to the Senate——

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment; but before I leave that subject let me get back to another phase of it.

Who are these three men?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I am going to yield. I will not be discourteous, but I want to finish what I started to talk about.

Mr. Slemp was one of the managers of Mr. Hoover's campaign. He was sent over to Paris as a reward, and placed in charge of the Colonial Exposition there—a splendid lucrative, entertaining berth. He is one of the members of what Mr. Hoover called the "locust swarm of lobbyists." Mr. Slemp has been as busy as he can be, and he is the master mind in this oil-tariff fight.

Who else is in it? Mr. Hitchcock, a delightful gentleman. I do not wish to reflect on him. He has a perfect right to accept employment or to stand for anything he wishes to stand for. But Mr. Hitchcock is up here every day. He is up here lobbying. A Senator who is unattached can not walk out without being pulled to one side and entreated by Mr. Hitchcock to help get a tariff on oil.

Mr. Wirt Franklin, I am told, is likely to be, perhaps, a Republican candidate for United States Senator in Oklahoma.

All of these gentlemen have a right to be here. I do not say that they are doing anything wrong; but I might say in passing that the "locust swarm of lobbyists" are very, very close to the highest powers that be in this Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not interested in lobbyists or anything else.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am, because I have had those boys to fight off before, and we can not get them in here to meet them face to face.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, let us get at this matter.

The price of crude oil on February 1, 1926, was $2.04 a barrel. The average gasoline price on the same day was 18.09 cents a gallon.

The price of crude oil on February 1, 1929, was $1.20 a barrel, nearly one-half less.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very glad the Senator has asked me that question.

Mr. SMOOT. The average price of gasoline on February 1, 1929, was 18.39 cents.

In other words, when the price of crude oil was $1.20, the price of gasoline was 18.39 cents; and when the price of crude oil was $2.04, the average gasoline price was 18.09 cents.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Utah, with words which fail to convey to him my gratitude, for proving so well what I have just been contending for, namely——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator wants my answer. Let him listen for a moment, if he will.

He contends that the price of gasoline and the price of oil have nothing to do with the price paid to the independent oil operator.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the price figured upon that chart——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment; and the Senator said, "What is going to happen to this country if we destroy the remaining competition of these poor little independent oil-well owners?"

Mr. SMOOT. I never said that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a minute. The contention is that these big companies then will have a monopoly, when the Senator himself shows that it does not make any difference now what they pay for crude oil; they charge what they want to for gasoline. Further than that, if I may say so to the Senator, the competition which the Senator is complaining about is the competition which is lowering the price. That is the competition he wants to get rid of. What good is competition if it does not lower the price? Why have any competition? So the argument about the competition of the independent producers out here and the need to keep them alive so that they can compete with this monopoly has no substance at all to it. The Senator from Utah is trying to destroy the only competition there is in this country and to give this monopoly such an iron grip on the situation that it can take from the people any amount of money it desires.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may say that that is what the Senator from Utah desires, but the Senator from Utah has not said a word about competition. I have not said a word as to the matters now referred to by the Senator. They have no place at all in the argument. What I do say, however, is this:

The Senator takes certain figures here and says the Treasury estimates that a 1-cent tax per gallon on the 16,500,000,000 gallons of gasoline used in the United States would return to the Government $165,000,000; that under the proposed tariff of 2½ cents a gallon, using the Treasury estimate as the basis, the consumer would pay annually an increase of $412,500,000; and that, in addition to gasoline, the consumer would pay, on the proposed increase of 21 cents on 348,630,000 barrels of fuel oil, $73,212,000. That is what the Senator asserts; and that can only happen by reason of assuming some given price for the crude oil and some given price for the gasoline sold. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that the price of gasoline was within a fraction of a cent the same when the price of crude oil was $2.04 a barrel and when it was $1.20 a barrel.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is asking me a question and answering it himself, so I see no need for me to make any further comment on it.

Mr. SMOOT. My statement was in answer to what the Senator said in relation to the position of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course I do not agree with the Senator. I have already answered that question; but let me go on.

We were at Michigan last. Now let us come to the big farming State of Minnesota.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. TYDINGS. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not resist interrupting here, because I am moved to do it by what it seemed to me the Senator from Utah was advocating. The figures he gave, as to a time when we had no tariff on oil, if they do anything, demonstrate that somebody has a monopoly, and that he is controlling the prices regardless of supply and demand.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. How in the world are we going to remedy that situation if we put a tariff on oil, and thus give the fellows who now control the situation a greater leverage than they have now?

Mr. TYDINGS. Exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that is exactly the reason, is it not, why the "big four," who control the great oil output of the country, are fighting so vigorously and bitterly this particular tariff?

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not know I was a member of the "big four."

Mr. JOHNSON. No, no. I recognize——

Mr. TYDINGS. I knew the Senator did not mean that. I simply said it jestingly.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the situation. Now, because they will profit so extraordinarily by this tariff, they are engaged in endeavoring to prevent its enactment! It is a species of altruism on the part of the Standard Oil Co., and the other great oil companies that we may commend, but which, of course, heretofore we have seldom seen.

Mr. TYDINGS. We were speaking of the State of Michigan last, and I now come to the State of Minnesota, where the farmers consume 183,783,628 gallons of gasoline annually. The additional tax of 2½ cents a gallon proposed to be levied by this bill would cost the farmers of Minnesota $4,594,591 a year in addition to that they now have to bear.

I wonder what the Senators from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. SCHALL] will do on this question which affects their people so vitally? I rather imagine the senior Senato from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], representing the Farmer-Labor Party, which has the interest of the farmers at heart, will vote against the imposition of this additional tax upon his people, and I rather suspect that perhaps the other Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] is not going to see the farmers of that vast agricultural State further burdened beneath the yoke of taxation, not for the benefit of the Government but for the benefit of the oil companies.

It must be very difficult on a man like Mr. Rockefeller. Think of a man who has invested hundreds of millions in securities of all kinds and during this depression sees them come down to a mere seventy-five or eighty or ninety million dollars from one hundred and seventy-five or two hundred million. Think of the loss, having only about $100,000,000 in liquid securities at this moment. Let the farmers not forget his plight, and let them shoulder willingly this burden and help him out of his financial mire.

Mississippi: The farmers of Mississippi consume 63,237,618 gallons of gasoline annually, meaning that the farmers of Mississippi, if the tariff is effective, will shoulder an addtional expense of $1,580,000 a year.

Missouri: The farmers of that State use 142,050,762 gallons of gasoline annually on the farms alone. That means that the farmers of Missouri, if this tariff is effective, will be put to a further annual expense of $3,551,269.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], a delightful friend, an able Senator, is not a candidate for reelection; so he is in the position where, when he votes, no one can question his motives. I would be the last man to question the motives of any Senator. But I say to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] I can not think that, representing the great State of Missouri, with all its thousands of farm failures and bank failures, and its utter depression, when the farmers are looking here for relief, when we have loaned money to the railroads, to the insurance companies, and to the banks, and done nothing whatsoever for agriculture except to destroy the market for their goods, the world market for the surplus, to drive their prices down and down and down, below the cost of production—I can not imagine that the junior Senator from Missouri, in a time like this, will vote an extra burden upon his people, the farmers of Missouri, of $3,551,269 annually.

Montana: That State is ably represented by my good friend and colleague the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who now presides over this body. I know that his regard for fairness and justice, and for the people out in his section, is too strong to permit him to be brought into this tariff matter, and to impose upon the people of Montana an additional burden of $1,043,000 annually, which the farmers of that State would have to pay over and above their expenses now if this tariff were effective.

The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], more than any other man, has fought the crookedness of the oil game over and over again, and with signal success. I can not imagine the senior Senator from Montana voting to put this much money into the hands of the oil companies. My regard and respect for him, even if he did vote for it, would cause me to believe that somehow or other his reasoning must be sound, but for the life of me I would have difficulty, with my own poor mental talents, in finding how it was possible to be on the other side of this question.

Nevada: I will pass over that State, to save time.

New Hampshire: The farmers of New Hampshire alone use 10,940,000 gallons of gasoline annually, and therefore if this tariff is adopted the farmers of New Hampshire will pay $273,000 additional each year for the gasoline they use on their farms.

I can not imagine that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] or the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], being such great friends of the farmers as they have been in the past, would impose this great burden upon the poor, struggling farmers of New Hampshire.

New Jersey: That is a State ably represented by that fine old gentleman—and I say it affectionately—the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and his new colleague, more of a contemporary of mine, the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. New Jersey is a trucking State. It has one of the biggest markets for farm products to be found in the Union—New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, Newark, and a regular network of industrial centers. We find that in New Jersey the farmers use 33,000,000 gallons of gasoline a year, and that means that they will pay in additional annual expenses for the operation of their farms, due to this increased cost of gasoline, $827,000, nearly a million dollars. I feel, without knowing, that the intelligence and the patriotism and regard of these two Senators for the people of New Jersey, particularly those engaged in the farming industry, will actuate them to vote against this nefarious tariff.

New York: We might think of New York as just a lot of big cities, but we find that the farmers of New York use 179,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually upon their farms.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHEELER in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not want the Senator to think that New York State is simply the city of New York. New York State is the second agricultural State of this Union, so that anything affecting the farmer is a matter of great concern to me.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was in New York once in my life, and I realize that what the Senator says is so.

The farmers of New York, may I say to the senior Senator from that State, would pay $4,482,000 more than they have to pay now to operate their farm machinery if this increased tax were put on gasoline.

North Carolina: I will insert the figures as to North Carolina in the RECORD later.

North Dakota: The farmers in that State alone use 78,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually, and their increased cost due to this tariff tax would be $1,959,000, which would go into the pockets of the 20 largest oil companies in the United States, and not into the coffers of the Government.

I can not imagine that either the able senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] or his colleague, the junior Senator [Mr. NYE], would place this heavy burden upon the already oppressed and failing and impoverished farmers of the Northwest.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. If I should agree with the argument of the Senator from Maryland, I might change my idea in regard to this proposed tariff on oil, but I can not agree with his argument. The tariff does not always mean the difference in the price that one might think it would. For instance, I hold in my hand a clipping from a North Dakota paper, under date of May 14, 1932, which gives the local market prices of grain. No. 1 northern wheat, which is the hard spring wheat, the best grade wheat, is bringing 48 cents a bushel. The tariff is 42 cents a bushel, and that leaves only 6 cents difference between the tariff and the price of wheat. I do not know what the price would be if it were not for the tariff. I think the same thing would apply to oil.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think that is a comparable figure. I wish it were possible that a gallon of gasoline could be in solid rather than in liquid form, and that we could put a 2½-cent stamp on each gallon, so that when a farmer bought a gallon of gasoline he would know that the large oil companies, due to this tariff, would have placed in their pockets 2½ cents for every gallon of gasoline the farmer uses on his farm.

Did I pass the State of Nebraska? I mentioned it, did I not?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not heard the Senator mention it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I meant to. The farmers of Nebraska use 135,815,648 gallons of gasoline on the farms alone, and the cost to the farmers of Nebraska will be $3,395,391 more, if this tariff is effective, than they are now paying for their gasoline, which will not go into the coffers of the Government, but which will go into the coffers of the large oil companies. I am glad to say that the State of Nebraska need not worry, because I rather imagine, without knowing too well, that both of its Senators will see that the farmers are protected from this outrageous rate upon their slender and remaining resources.

Ohio: That is the home of the chairman of the Republican National Committee, the affable Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who always insists, in Republican conventions, that the farmer get what is coming to him, at least in the platform. He ought to have it somewhere. I want to read from the Republican Campaign Book of 1928, and I would like particularly the attention of the senior Senator from Nebraska, because it is short, and I think he will be interested in seeing how those men who criticize him sometimes for his independence have remained true to the great principles which they themselves criticize the Senator on occasions for adhering to, for it was said in the Republican Campaign Book of 1928:

The two outstanding features of the present tariff act (the Fordney-McCumber Act) from the standpoint of agriculture are that no previous American tariff ever approached this one either in the number and variety of agricultural products given protection—

We have just heard from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] how they have been protected—or in the degree of protection afforded them; and, second, no previous American tariff ever excelled this one in the number and variety of commodities peculiarly essential to the pursuit of agriculture which are on the free list.

In 1928 these commodities, such as oil, which the farmer uses, "peculiarly essential to the pursuit of agriculture," were on the free list, but that was the year when we wanted to get elected, and, of course, we are going to say that all over again, even if we put this tariff in.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the time we want to get ready to raise money so that we can be elected next fall.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator his diagnosed the disease even better than I have.

I do not want to let my party off, either, because we made a similar declaration. The Democratic platform as long ago as 1920 said:

The Democratic Party recognizes the importance of the acquisition by Americans of additional sources of supply of petroleum and other minerals and declares that such acquisition at home and abroad should be fostered and encouraged.

In 1920 we said, "Go out and conserve our own oil supply. Go out and invest your money." Of course, no Democrat is going back on that. We will be found solid against this tariff. No man will waiver. Every Democrat will be true to the principles and the platform promises. I can not imagine that a platform like a street-car platform—made to get in on, but not to stand on. [Laughter.]

We had gotten down to Ohio, and I know my genial friend the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is not going to place a burden of $4,624,164 on the farmers of his State greater than they now have to pay, which would be the additional price they would have to pay for their gasoline, because on the farms of Ohio alone the farmers use 184,966,574 gallons of gasoline annually.

The Senator, I believe, was the keynoter at the last Republican convention. When he shows that these things so essential and necessary to agriculture are on the free list, I would imagine the Senator, already having stated his position that oil should be considered at least in a separate measure, would not condescend to go back on the printed word of his party, holding the high official position which he does, and propose to tax the farmers of his State at the same time over $4,000,000 at a time when he is leading his party forth again to what he hopes will be victory.

Even in Oklahoma, where we look and wonder at the great oil wells, we find the farmers alone using 105,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually, and that their increased cost will be $2,625,000 a year if this tariff is adopted and is effective as its proponents on this side of the Chamber, at least, say it will be in raising the price.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know anyone advocating the amendment who does not advocate it for the sole and only purpose of increasing the price? Is not that the object of it?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that is the only fair inference which any judicially minded person could draw.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, and if it is effective—and it is claimed that it will be effective, and there is no other excuse for advocating it—it seems to me that the figures stated by the Senator would naturally follow.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator. I do not think any other conclusion can rightfully be drawn except that I do think special treatment ought to be accorded to such men as Mr. Slemp, who is high in the councils of one of our parties, and to Mr. Hitchcock, Mr. Franklin, and others in the other party, for their absolute detachment in this matter. These men are out to help the poor independent oil producers. They would not think of putting this tariff on to help the big companies. They are too patriotic for that.

In the State of Oregon the farmers use 48,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually. This tariff would mean, of course, an increased cost to the farmers of Oregon of $1,223,213 a year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland allow me to say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is the contention of those who favor the tax that there is no more relation between the price of gasoline and the price of crude oil than there is between the price of bread and the price of raw wheat.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me——

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the statement of the Senator from Texas, but I understand the object in asking for a tariff on oil is to permit the oil producers of this country to get more money. What else is the object of it? Taking their own theory of it, the figures of the Senator from Maryland would follow.

Personally, I think that the price of crude oil and gasoline is in the control of an enormous monopoly, a trust which covers the entire United States. As the figures show, they own most of the production, storage facilities, pipe lines, and refining facilities. They have them now, and they fix the price of gasoline in every hamlet and in every city of the United States. For the life of me I can not understand how we are going to relieve the American people from the domination of that trust and that monopoly by putting a tariff on oil and thus taking away whatever possibility of competition might otherwise exist.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to go into these matters at the present time because I do not want to disturb the continuity of the address of the Senator from Maryland, but our contention is that whatever increase in price there is will be absorbed by the monopoly, or the near monopoly.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska that everyone knows and the figures show that we are exporting a great deal more oil than we are importing.

Mr. NORRIS. And for that reason, for instance, the figures given by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] have no application, because he took a tariff on a product of which we have a great surplus.

Mr. TYDINGS. But it is claimed that this oil can be produced in South America more cheaply than it can be produced in the United States, and therefore if we stop it from coming to the United States, obviously, it will go to Europe or wherever we are selling it, because it can be sold there more successfully and it will take that market, so the net amount of oil that we will sell will be the same. We will not having foreign oil coming in here replacing our oil, but it will replace our export oil. Therefore if we do not sell any more oil in the world in the aggregate and if the tariff does not increase the price, by their own argument that defeats both the ends which they seek to accomplish.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not think the Senator from Maryland is having any trouble to convince the Senator from Nebraska in this matter.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; because he is very intelligent. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I want to amplify a little bit the point the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] made. Not only will this tariff be absorbed by the Oil Trust, but we know as a matter of fact that where there is an oil monopoly the price is a great deal higher. In other words, the Senator has stated that we export a great deal more oil than we import, thus showing very clearly that we do not need to import any oil to this country to take care of our needs here. But in the country where they are producing this oil at $1.03 per barrel less than it costs us here, what is the Senator's explanation as to why those people are paying twice as much for gasoline?

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to reply to the proposition of the Senator, but let us go along gradually and clear the way as we go.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is not going to answer my question, then?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I am going to answer it; but the Senator has stated three or four propositions and we have got to get those cleared up before we can get a correct answer to the question. The Senator concedes that we are exporting more oil than we are importing. We have that point settled.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator said that we can produce this oil in South America more cheaply than we can produce oil in the United States.

Mr. LONG. Yes; $1.03 a barrel cheaper.

Mr. TYDINGS. We have that settled. If we stop that oil from coming into the United States, where will it go?

Mr. LONG. I do not know where it will go. What is the significance of that?

Mr. TYDINGS. If it can be produced more cheaply than the American oil and if the American oil is now being exported in greater quantities than it is being imported, and if we bar this foreign oil it will immediately go into the world market, where it will displace just so much American oil, because it can be produced, according to the Senator's statement, more cheaply than we can produce oil here, so that the total volume of American oil sold in the world will be exactly the same.

Mr. LONG. I am very glad the Senator has made that statement, because he has met himself coming back. The very interests that he points out on his map—I say "his" map. I assume he made the map or had it made under his direction.

Mr. TYDINGS. The map was made under my direction.

Mr. LONG. I have seen that same map many times.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; the Senator never saw that map, because it was made only five days ago and has been locked up in my office.

Mr. LONG. I can almost read it with my eyes closed. The Senator stated the major oil companies own 51 per cent of production.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to answer the Senator's question, but let us get my proposition straightened out first.

Mr. LONG. I am straightening it out for the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does not the Senator know that if we produce a foreign oil more cheaply than American oil, and if we stop that foreign oil from coming into America, it will immediately enter into competition with our export oil? The Senator concedes that. We can not compete with that oil. That is the reason why it is here. They will take our foreign market. As we are already exporting more oil than we are importing, the net amount of American oil sold in the world remains constant.

Mr. LONG. The Senator would not let me answer his question nor will he answer my question. I will answer that question. The Senator has shown on the map which he has taken a long time to make up, although I have seen one just like it many times before, that 51 per cent of the oil produced in America is produced by the major oil companies. How and why are those major oil companies exporting and selling American oil in England, Wales, and Scandinavia that cost $1.03 more per barrel for them to make than the oil they have in Venezuela? Why are they to-day taking oil in America that cost $1.03 more a barrel to make and sending it to England and bringing into this country oil from Venezuela instead of sending the Venezuelan oil to England, except for this monopoly?

Now, one more question——

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator want his questions answered as he asks them?

Mr. LONG. Answer that question, if the Senator can.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to tell the Senator from Louisiana that I am delighted; I am absolutely delighted. Mr. President, I have 500 tariff amendments on my desk and the very first one that I take up and hold in my hand is to reduce the tariff on aluminum. No aluminum at all is imported into the United States, but the Aluminum Co. sells its aluminum abroad at a lower price than it sells it in the United States. So I know when this amendment comes up that the Senator from Louisiana, who is going to take care of his people, just in line with the argument he has just made, is going to give me his unqualified support, so that I have one of the oil proponents lined up for at least one of my new amendments to the tariff act.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is making his boast as well as some of his statistics on the matter. The question I have asked has not been answered.

Mr. TYDINGS. What was the question?

Mr. LONG. I asked why the Standard Oil Co. is exporting oil from America that cost $1.03 more to make here than a barrel of oil costs them in Venezuela, and then is bringing Venezuelan oil into America? Can the Senator explain how that is done?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not understand the Senator's question. I wish he would ask it again. It seems to be so involved that I can not get at what he wants to know. If he will ask me again I will certainly try my best to answer it.

Mr. LONG. The ordinary Louisianan in the third reader would understand the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand, then, why they vote in Louisiana the way they do. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. The question I am asking is this—and I am asking it of the leader of the interests undertaking to keep this tariff from going on oil: Why is it that the Standard Oil Co., which the Senator says owns 51 per cent of the domestic production of oil, is exporting American oil which costs it $1.03 more to produce in America than the oil which it owns in Venezuela, and is bringing the Venezuelan oil to America?

Mr. TYDINGS. What Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. LONG. All of them. Does the Senator know how many there are?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. LONG. I will tell the Senator some of them.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator is familiar with the oil combine, but I have no acquaintance with it.

Mr. LONG. I am referring to the common family group known as the Oil Trust group in America.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know what it is.

Mr. LONG. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States listed those subsidiaries a number of years ago. That is not on the Senator's map, but there is a list.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; here they are right here [indicating]—the major companies.

Mr. LONG. Now the Senator has not answered me, and I know the Senator is more intelligent than he would have us infer. I know the Senator is intelligent enough to absorb this: Why are these major oil companies, whose position in this matter he is most masterfully and patriotically championing, sending oil out of America to-day which costs $1.03 a barrel more than the Venezuelan oil costs and bringing the Venezuelan oil to America, except to destroy the independent oil business of this country and perpetuate the monopoly?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us be serious for a moment. The Senator claims that the men who own the local production also own the importing production.

Mr. LONG. No; not all of it.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was the Senator's question.

Mr. LONG. Let me answer the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; the Senator asked me why it was that these companies which now own 51 per cent of the local production send that oil abroad instead of the oil which comes from Venezuela. I ask the Senator if he owns two farms and it costs him 5 cents a dozen to raise eggs on one farm and 10 cents a dozen to raise eggs on the other farm whether it makes any difference which farm his eggs come from when he sells them to the public.

Mr. LONG. In answer let me say to the Senator that the Standard Oil Co. has taken one ship to send American oil to England and has taken another ship to send Venezuelan oil to America—two ships—when one ship would have carried the oil from Venezuela to England and it would not have been necessary to run two liners. I ask the Senator what excuse there was for the Standard Oil Co. paying two times the transportation cost in order to send oil out of America that was costing $1.03 more a barrel than the oil in Venezuela.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is perfectly obvious that that is a question of company management and not a question of tariff. I revert to the former illustration, that if the Senator owns two farms and is raising eggs on both farms and it costs him 5 cents to raise eggs on one farm and 10 cents to raise them on the other, it makes no difference from which farm he sells his eggs if he sells them in a market where he dictates the price.

Mr. LONG. I should like to settle the question with the Senator on the egg basis.

Mr. TYDINGS. I answered the Senator's question candidly and frankly and in such a way that he himself can not refute the answer, and I refuse to yield further at this time.

Mr. LONG. Will not the Senator yield for just one more question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator owned a farm in Nebraska on which he was raising eggs and owned a farm in Louisiana on which he was raising eggs, would he ship the eggs from the Nebraska farm to the Louisiana farm and ship those on the Louisiana farm to the Nebraska farm, or would he eat the eggs on the respective farms where they were raised?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is a fair question, and I will give the Senator a complete answer. If I had a farm manager on each one of those farms, and instead of having two farms, had seven, I would not know where the manager of each one of those farms was selling his eggs, even if he were Mr. Rockefeller. So there would be seven farm managers selling seven different sets of eggs in seven different markets.

Mr. LONG. The Senator thinks that the managers of a business do not know what the men under them are doing?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think—and the Senator has not denied it—that if we stop the importation of foreign oil into this country we will drive the imported oil into the world's market, where it will displace just so much American oil, so that the net amount of oil sold will be the same so far as American production is concerned.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. LONG moved toward the door of the Chamber.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator wants to give up his own fight so rapidly, I have no objection.

Mr. LONG. I understood the Senator did not want me to interrogate him further.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator only wants to ask questions; he does not want to get answers which he can not answer.

Mr. LONG. I will remain. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was motioning me away from the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wanted to conclude, because I thought the Senator was not interested in hearing the answers.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is mistaken. I beg pardon.

Mr. TYDINGS. Well, Mr. President, I may say that the tone of this debate, without any reflection on my friend—and I include my own contribution thereto in the last few minutes—has neither been uplifting nor enlightening, and I prefer now to follow the sequence of my remarks.

Mr. LONG. I confess my part of that.

Mr. TYDINGS. In Pennsylvania the farmers use 152,015,000 gallons of gasoline annually on their farms. The tax of 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline will mean that the farmers of Pennsylvania will pay $3,800,000 in additional expenses over what they now are forced to bear.

The farmers of Texas use 224,221,000 gallons of gasoline annually. If this tax shall be imposed, it will mean an increased cost of gasoline upon the farmers of Texas of $5,605,000 annually.

The farmers of Virginia use 72,000,000 gallons of gasoline annually. So if this new tax of 2½ cents a gallon shall be placed upon the consumption of gasoline by the farmers of Virginia, it will mean an extra burden and expense of $1,819,000 a year.

In the State of Washington the farmers alone use 53,934,802 gallons of gasoline annually. This tariff of 2½ cents a gallon will mean an extra tax burden to the farmers of Washington of $1,348,370 more than they now bear, which will not go into the Treasury of the United States but in the pockets of the 20 large oil companies.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the entire table to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I did not hear the Senator's statement as to my State. Did he put those figures in the RECORD?

Mr. TYDINGS. Those figures are in the RECORD, but I shall be glad to read them to the Senator. I skipped a few States in order to save time.

In the State of South Carolina the farmers use 40,946,600 gallons of gasoline annually. The imposition of the 2½-cent tax will mean that the farmers alone in the Senator's State will take up an extra burden of $1,023,665 over and above what they now bear, and that that will not go into the Federal Treasury but will go into the pockets of the large oil companies. The farmers of the Senator's State will be placed in the position of paying tribute to the large oil companies, and I know now, without even asking the Senator, viewing his long record here in the interest of the farmer, that the proposal to enact this tariff will have his unyielding opposition.

No man on the floor of the Senate ever made a more eloquent appeal against the tariff than the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. The Senator from Arizona, commenting on the Capper bill providing for an embargo on oil, on the floor on March 2, 1931, as will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 6722 and 6733, said:

> We are asked, in behalf of the Sinclairs and the Dohenys, to put an embargo on the importation of oil.
>
> Mr. President, there is a larger question here than the mere question of serving the oil interests and the Dohenys and Sinclairs of this country. Are we going to levy a tax, already too heavy, upon every person who uses an automobile, upon every farmer who has a motor upon his farm, in order to swell the profits, already great, of the oil industry?
>
> Mr. President, as a rule when we listen to the independents it is the voice of Jacob, but it is the hand of Esau.

We do not need any stronger attack on the oil tariff proposal than that splendid assertion of the fine Senator from Arizona.

Now, just a word about production and I shall finish. Here [indicating on chart] is shown the oil production of the entire world. The United States of America produces 63.69 per cent, about two-thirds, in round numbers, of all the oil produced in the entire world. The United States exports more oil than it imports. If the contention of the proponents of the oil tariff is sound, namely, that oil can be produced in Venezuela at a lower figure than it can be produced in America, obviously if we shut out this oil [indicating on the chart] from the American market, if that oil can be produced at a lower figure than oil can be produced in the United States, it immediately goes to the foreign market, where it displaces just that much United States oil. So, in the last analysis, the producer of American oil, if this proposed tariff shall be effective, will not sell one gill more of the total oil consumed in the world that he now sells. That is unanswerable. No one can dispute that. That is something that no proponent of this tariff, so far as I have heard, has successfully disputed. That being so, what difference does it make?

Who owns the Venezuelan oil? The same group that owns 51 per cent of all the American production. The independent oil operator is not going to get a sou, farthing, one-twentieth of a mill, more for a single gallon of oil he produces, and nothing more eloquent is needed to prove that assertion than the statement of the proponents of the oil tariff that quite often when crude oil is selling for almost nothing, gasoline is selling at an abnormally high price, showing that the large interests regulate the prices to suit themselves. But even if that were not so, with about two-thirds of one year's supply of oil now in the pipe lines of the 20 large companies, a sufficient quantity to supply the entire country for eight months without injecting one gallon of oil more in the pipe lines, they can refuse for eight months to buy a gill of oil from the independent oil companies.

More than that, they can refuse to buy for over a year, because, in addition to the eight months' supply they now have, they own half the production, so that when they place what they now have in the pipe lines, plus what they can put in the pipe lines from their own wells, they have one year and six months' oil supply, which is sufficient to meet every oil requirement in the United States for 18 months without injecting another gill in the pipe lines or taking another gill from the independent oil wells. What man is naïve, simple, asinine enough, with a monopoly of that magnitude, with a year and a half's supply on hand, to think that a few hundred thousand honest but unfortunate little independent oil-well owners can buck up against a year and a half's supply and a wealth of pipe lines and refineries? The suggestion is so absurd that no man who really contends for such a tariff as is proposed can, in my humble judgment, demonstrate by facts where the independent oil producer is going to get a single cent of benefit.

Mr. President, I have spoken long enough, and I will subside for the time being, but before I yield the floor I should like to put some tables into the RECORD with a preceding statement. I want to show who is responsible for the plight of the small oil owners. I ask that the table and statement, which I now send to the desk, may be inserted at this place in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement and table are as follows:

SECTION 5—WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE PLIGHT OF THE SMALL WELL OWNER

Much has been written and much has been said of the plight of the farmer owners of the "stripper wells"; there are 22,000 of them in Kansas alone.

The owners of these wells need but look at the figures of the overproduction in Texas and Oklahoma and California to realize why it has been necessary for them to close these wells down from time to time. It is not the imports entering the Atlantic seaboard which affect their condition. It is the overproduction of their neighboring States.

The oft-repeated statements that these stripper wells are permanent losses is answered by the Bureau of Mines in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee and published in the 1931 hearings on the subject of an oil embargo. It follows in part:

"Some proponents of restrictive oil legislation repeatedly have stressed and have given the unqualified inference that the production from some 300,000 wells in the United States will be irrevocably destroyed unless those wells are allowed to produce without interruption to the end of their normal lives. It is well recognized that a serious economic condition faces the individual owner of pumping wells.

"In these wells the lifting costs are frequently many times that of wells where the force for lifting the oil is supplied by the expansive energy of the originally contained or associated natural gas. Lifting costs usually determine the margin of profit for producing crude oil; and when the market is depressed because of an abundance of oil, either from flowing domestic wells or from other sources, the so-called "stripper" wells are usually the first to feel this depression. Because of the investment in these relatively small producers, and because their owners or lessees, in general, are an essential part of the American oil industry, it seems fundamentally sound that equitable relief should be given.

"However, in an honest and unprejudiced analysis of the present economic condition of the American oil industry, it should be recognized that the figures which have been used to designate the number of wells presumably needing relief are largely theoretical. Even assuming that 300,000 wells out of the total of 328,200 producing wells in the United States (Bureau of Mines figures as of December 31, 1929) were to be 'shut in' for a period of time, present engineering knowledge shows it to be illogical to suppose that all of the production from these wells would be henceforth unrecoverable, thus defeating the true policy of oil conservation. Defective casing and other poor conditioning of wells will invite migration of water, and some oil will be trapped in the sands; but to suppose that all of those wells will be ruined if they are not operated is misinformation based upon lack of engineering knowledge regarding the flow of oil and water through sands and unfamiliarity with the experience in certain areas where water migration has been definitely controlled, and in still other areas where, after production was 'shut in' for a relatively long period, resumed production was at a higher rate than previous to the 'shutting in' of the wells."

The following chart, prepared by the Department of Commerce from statistics furnished by the Bureau of Mines and Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, shows graphically the production, importation, and exportation of oils in the American industry during the last 60 years:

Production, importation, and exportation of oils in the American industry for 60 years

Mr. TYDINGS. I also ask to insert in the RECORD the report of the Tariff Commission on cost of production at home and abroad, following the insertion just made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SECTION 6. TARIFF COMMISSION'S REPORT ON COSTS OF PRODUCTION AT HOME AND ABROAD

Last year before the Senate Committee on Commerce the remarkable argument was presented that there was not necessarily any relation between the price of crude and gasoline. This statement has been assiduously peddled by propagandists, circulated broadly through the press, and presented to Congress committees with the obvious intent of disarming the public mind in relation to the inevitable increase in the cost of gasoline.

The Federal Trade Commission, the American Petroleum Institute, and other competent and disinterested organizations have repeatedly shown its falsity.

Until their appearances this year before the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Franklin and his associates have repeatedly argued that the price of fuel oil was too low and that the purpose of the bill was to increase the price at the well. These statements have now been discarded, and both the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee this year were informed that the proposed tax would not affect the price of fuel oil to the consumer.

Last year crude oil was as low as 10 cents a barrel at the well; this year it is ranging around $1. A year ago Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, mobilized the militia to stop wasteful overproduction, and proclaimed to the world that his ambition was to compel curtailment of production in the hope that oil would again sell at the well for $1. Governor Murray has realized his ambition not through the barriers afforded by an embargo or a protective tariff but through the old-fashioned method of applying a little common sense to the end that the laws of supply and demand be respected.

Having completely failed to reverse the laws of trade by the remarkable premise that there is no connection between the price of crude and gasoline, the proponents of this measure are now attempting to use the recent report of the Tariff Commission to establish their contention that there is a differential in favor of imported oils of $1.05 per barrel.

Any literate person could not knowingly make such mistakes as they have done. There is no such differential in favor of the importers. There is none at all. This phase of the controversy was discussed in considerable detail before the Finance Committee. It will be found in the testimony of Paul H. Harwood, pages 457–471 of the Finance Committee hearings:

"The Tariff Commission, in its report for the years 1927–1930, reports not a difference in cost of $1.03 per barrel, as alleged by Mr. Franklin, but of 46 cents, on the basis of 'like or similar products' as required by the tariff act (p. 3), but calls attention to three disparities in its calculation to the disadvantage of the Venezuelan product, each of which would, when properly determined and taken into account, reduce this difference in cost.

"1. It admits that in figuration of cost to produce crude it has applied to the foreign oil the same rate of interest and depreciation as applied to the domestic crude. It admits (p. 59) an adjustment of interest charges would increase the cost of foreign crude 5 cents per barrel.

"Adjustment of depreciation, recognizing that foreign crude is produced in tropical climates where destruction is rapid, would add another 5 cents per barrel.

"These items, properly taken into account, would lower the difference of 46 cents per barrel to 36 cents per barrel.

"2. It calls attention (p. 2, last paragraph) to the fact that while actual bare cost of transportation has been used to calculate the cost of landing Venezuelan oil on Atlantic seaboard, 49 cents per barrel has been used in calculating cost of landing domestic crude oil here, this being an average, not of cost of pipe-line transport, but of actual published pipe-line charges. Interstate Commerce Commission's reports show that for 1930, the last year covered by this report, the ratio of operating expenses, taxes, and 6 per cent interest, to operating revenue, is 60 per cent.

"3. In its figuration of comparative values of yields from the two crudes the commission admits that the value of the gas and fuel oil yield out of Venezuelan crude is much below that of the higher-quality gas and fuel oil yields out of domestic crudes. (It admits value of foreign yield is only 2.55 cents per gallon while domestic yield is worth 2.93 cents per gallon, a difference of 0.38 cent per gallon.) But it states that nevertheless it applied the higher domestic value to both crudes in calculation of total value of yields of both oils. The report states (p. 54):

"The significance of any overvaluation of the gas and fuel oils from foreign crude is evident from the fact that these oils constitute considerably over 30 gallons of the product obtained from each barrel of crude (42 gallons) * * * there may be an overstatement of the value of the products from foreign crudes due to the method used amounting to 10 to 15 cents per barrel, or even more.

"The overvaluation of gas and fuel oil derivatives in each barrel of foreign crude might then amount to 15 cents per barrel, which, subtracted from the remaining 16.4 cents, practically wipes out the remaining apparent advantage for Venezuelan crude oil.

"Therefore the correct interpretation of the Tariff Commission's report for the year ending in 1930 is that there is no appreciable advantage in cost of Venezuelan crude, as compared with like or similar domestic products.

"The supplemental report of the commission to the Ways and Means Committee, covering year 1931, shows still lower domestic costs due to the development of the cheaper but highly valuable crude of east Texas; and that the average domestic delivered cost at Atlantic points, without adjustment for lowered pipe-line rates, has fallen 22 cents per barrel, or from $1.90, average for three years, to $1.68 per barrel.

"Therefore, on the face of the two Tariff Commission's reports, there is no advantage in foreign crude costs, but, on the contrary, domestic crudes are deliverable at Atlantic ports, value for value, at least 20 cents a barrel under the foreign costs."

Mr. TYDINGS. I want also to put into the RECORD the party platforms on the subject of oil. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] would perhaps enjoy the humor of hearing both party platforms on this subject. I read the Democratic platform first. This plank was adopted as long ago as 1920:

The Democratic Party recognizes the importance of the acquisition by Americans of additional sources of supply of petroleum and other minerals and declares that such acquisition, at home and abroad, should be fostered and encouraged.

The Republican platform in 1928 contained this astounding statement:

The two outstanding features of the present tariff—

That was the Fordney-McCumber Act—

The two outstanding features of the present tariff (Fordney-McCumber) standpoint of agriculture are: (1) No previous American tariff ever approached this one either in the number and variety of agricultural products given protection or in the degree of protection afforded them, and (2) no previous American tariff ever excelled this one in the number and variety of commodities peculiarly essential to the pursuit of agriculture which are on the free list.

Of course, oil is not peculiarly essential to the pursuit of agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator a copy of the platforms for this year?

Mr. TYDINGS. Whether we adopt this tariff amendment or not, both sides are going to try to surpass one another in finding ways in which we shall tell not only the farmer but all the people how everything will be all right if they will just let us take charge. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I notice that in paragraph (4), which the Senator has been discussing from the standpoint of the 2½-cent tax on gasoline, there is also a tax of 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil. Of course, lubricating oil is as essential to the life and efficiency of our motor vehicles as gasoline. In addition to that, I see that paraffine and other petroleum wax products are taxed at the rate of 1 cent per pound, and that natural asphalt and asphalt and bitumen derived from petroleum are taxed at the rate of 10 cents per hundred pounds. Does not the latter provision refer to the ingredient that is used in road construction?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question; and, as I have briefly referred to the increased cost of road construction which would result from the imposition of this tariff, I will take the liberty of reading a statement on that subject, if the Senator is interested.

Mr. SMITH. I am very much interested, because the specific gravity of this material is pretty great; and a tax of 10 cents per hundred pounds on this road-building material, it seems to me, would increase the cost of road construction incalculably. As the public is now largely dependent upon hard-surfaced roads or treated roads for the use of motor vehicles, this material is as essential as gasoline and oil.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right; and here is the situation as it affects road building:

The bill before the Senate proposes a tariff of ½ cent per gallon or 21 cents per barrel on imported crude oil, and of 10 cents per hundredweight or $2 per ton on finished asphalt imported.

The result of both or either schedule would be to raise the price of asphalt over $2 a ton. It has sold this year at $8.50 a ton. The greater part of all paving asphalt is made from imported heavy crude oils in Atlantic coast refineries. There is simply not enough of the heavy asphaltic crude now produced domestically to supply the needs of American States, counties, and the Federal Government for road repair and building material.

Practically all asphalt manufactured now goes into road making. It is the prime product in present road-building programs. It is therefore the Federal Government, the States, and the counties that will pay the increased price. For the Federal Government, it may prove to be just a stand-off; the increased price paid may be equal to the duties on asphalt-bearing crude oil imported; but the resulting increase of 20 per cent in cost will be nation-wide, and will be an additional and unnecessary charge on States and other political subdivisions.

The tariff schedules in question have no reason for being. They will be paid manifold, not by the importer but by our sorely beset State and county treasuries or by the tax-paying country dweller, deprived of his road by the increased cost of road material.

The import tax on imported crude oil and asphalt is simply and only a charge on our local governments, and any resulting income will be paid back by the Federal Government in the resulting higher price.

Even assuming that we would get some revenue from this tax, we would pay it many times over by the increase of all the road appropriations which we make; and, of course, the States likewise would be penalized.

Later on I may have occasion to refer to other phases of this matter. For the present I have devoted myself almost entirely to the farmer's new burden in this connection. As the debate progresses, and when I have had a little lunch and have come back I shall be glad to talk about other phases of the matter.

Mr. HULL obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Enormous increases of expenditure have been indicated here as a result of the use that the farmers make of gasoline. I wish the Senator or some one who has the time would find out what would be the additional burden on all the American people who use gasoline, calculated on the same basis.

Mr. TYDINGS. The burden that I just referred to and allocated to the various States was, in round numbers, $95,000,000 annually, which the farmers alone would pay if the price of their gasoline were increased 2½ cents a gallon. The total burden borne by all the people, including the farmers, would be $486,000,000, of which amount nearly $100,000,000 would be placed on agriculture, the remaining $386,000,000 on industry generally—the owner of the pleasure automobile, the factory, and so forth.

Now, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee was recognized. Does the Senator yield for a quorum call?

Mr. HULL. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, the Nation and the world today face a critical industrial, financial, and general economic situation.

During the postwar period governments here and everywhere, and peoples here and everywhere, have been indulging in an orgy of fast living and overspending and other wild and riotous kinds of conduct, with the result that today all governmental agencies in all countries find themselves hopelessly overloaded with debt, overwhelmed with expenditures, and borne down with taxes.

At the same time we see an almost hopeless slump in prices of commodities and values of securities. They have reached a most amazing level, equal to that of common bankruptcy. They have reached a level almost below the amount of the debts they are supposed to secure and lie behind. At the same time commerce has been correspondingly drying up, especially our international commerce. It is to-day below $20,000,000,000. It should be forty-eight and three-quarters billion dollars. The share of the United States should be three and one-third more billions in excess of what it is to-day.

Mr. President, the business of this Nation and of all nations is on an almost wholly artificial basis, due to every conceivable kind of restrictions and restraints and obstructions to commerce and to the most legitimate and profitable transfer of capital and goods and services across international boundaries. The amazing condition presents itself here to-day of our foreign trade being at a rate less than one-third of what it was before the panic broke in 1929 and is on a steadily diminishing basis.

We find, as a general result, unemployment on an unprecedented scale, unemployment of eight to ten million wage earners in this country, and of tens of millions in other countries, who, with their families, would aggregate between seventy-five and one hundred million human beings walking up and down this earth in idleness, without employment, without food, and with inadequate shelter. We find along with this general collapse of international credit, exchange, trade, and finance a general lowering of living standards among all peoples everywhere. We find the great agricultural population in most countries reduced almost to a state of peasantry, hopelessly overwhelmed with debt, with no possible market opportunities for their surpluses.

We find again, Mr. President, that during the past 8 to 12 years each nation, largely under American leadership, has undertaken very strictly to pursue what is well known and understood as the policy of living unto itself as nearly as may be humanly possible. This policy has had coupled with it the further policy of obstructing any and all economic relations with other countries which might be humanly possible to avoid. This at the same time has carried with it a domestic-tariff policy which has had as its primary purpose the artificial encouragement of the very maximum of production in every line of industry. This postwar policy under American initiative and American leadership was naturally followed by all the other important countries of the world, either through self-defense or through the example of influential American leadership.

There was no way, following the war, for America to avoid her responsibility as a leader, especially in the financial and economic affairs of the world. We were the most powerful and influential Nation with respect to the possession of gold and credit and natural resources and efficient productive plants, merchant marine, export trade, and a vast indebtedness due us from other governments. Nothing was more natural or more inevitable than that we occupied a more powerful and influential position of leadership in world economic affairs than any or all other countries combined, and there is no way by which we could or can shake off or evade that responsibility.

Mr. President, there were two courses we as a nation could have pursued. One was the course of urging every nation to live as nearly as possible unto itself. Notwithstanding the fact that we had become a great creditor and a great surplus-producing nation as a result of the war transition, we decided that we would pursue the policy of living strictly unto ourselves, or as nearly so as possible. That has meant, under the artificial stimulus of domestic industry, that our oil people, our coal people, and our copper people, and our zinc, our lead, our wheat, corn, oats, rye, and a long list of other surplus-producing industries, some with and some without tariffs, have equally accumulated vast undisposable surpluses. We find every important country, with industries of any consequence, laboring and groaning under enormous surpluses hopelessly dammed up by every conceivable sort of obstruction to commerce among nations. We find every important country hopelessly glutted with these vast surpluses.

Mr. President, that was not within itself the only disconcerting and disastrous phase of these unfortunate troubles which have overtaken this and other countries. The very moment the nations made it impossible to treat with each other, monetary instability began to appear. All the creditor nations having favorable trade balances demanded payment in gold, thereby draining debtor nations of their reserves, so that within a reasonable time our whole currency situation got out of balance; and it is still out of balance, with the result that in every country we see to-day every sort of artificial stimulants and nostrums proposed to deal with the currency and the credit and the deflated-commodity-price situation. The condition is indescribably chaotic as it relates to industrial, financial, and commercial affairs here and everywhere.

Mr. President, in the midst of all this serious situation, involving great fundamental problems, involving the task of this and other countries to analyze and ascertain the basic causes and prescribe basic remedies, with this tremendous task and responsibility pressing heavily upon us, we find some of our well-meaning friends, representing great international industries, industries whose commodities are bought and sold in all the markets of the world every day in the year, rushing down here to the Capitol and asking that all these real problems be shunted aside and placed in indefinite abeyance. They come here and ask us to suspend all business for an indefinite time, while they present themselves in the Capitol and ask for a tariff crutch or rolling chair, or some other imaginary assistance the need of which they have conjured up in their minds.

Here comes the giant oil industry, a great $12,000,000,000 business in this country, involving a natural resource which does not cost anybody a penny to create, a great industry which has had to its advantage during the past 10 years a favorable balance of exports in the huge amount of $3,600,000,000, coming here and complacently demanding that the peoples' representatives, the representatives of the American public, shall vote to this huge octopus—and I say that in no spirit of criticism—a special subsidy running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, to be paid for largely by the 30,000,000 farm population, hopelessly prostrate, overwhelmed with debt, with commodity prices so low it does not pay to remove farm products from the farm; a demand also that the wage-earning population, which, with their families, aggregate sixty to seventy million, together with the agricultural population, shall bear the lion's share of this bald, unadulterated subsidy in the way of an increased price, under tariff shelter, above what the price to the farmer and wage earner would otherwise be.

The people's representatives, persons sworn to represent the American public, persons under oath to represent the American agricultural population and the average citizen, all citizens alike, with impartiality are asked to walk up here and vote this amazing special subsidy to the most powerful industry in the United States excepting the banking industry. In the name of God, Mr. President, I am wondering what the country is coming to if that is the highest level to which American statesmanship can rise in dealing with these vast fundamental panic conditions.

I want to glance back just a moment and see what really has occurred. This Nation had the opportunity during 10 years following the war, with the $17,000,000,000 which it was ready to loan abroad with which to pay for exports and develop new markets everywhere, with the $11,000,000,000 which had already been loaned to foreign nations during the war, with our tremendous surplus-producing capacity of $15,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000 or $25,000,000,000, with by far the most efficient manufacturing plants in all the history of manufacturing, with a merchant marine, with every possible agency and equipment to arouse itself like a sleeping giant by labor and work everywhere, growing cotton, producing oil, producing automobiles ad libitum, and then as England did and as many other great commercial nations have done, as we have made these immense loans, as we have come in contact with other countries in a thousand ways, when the fullest opportunity for establishing commercial contacts and developing unlimited markets, to the end that all our capital and our labor might be employed here at home in the most profitable manner.

Yet instead of taking that course, our leadership, not the leadership of any particular group, but a small segment of so-called business leadership, arrogating to itself the authority for speaking for all American business, elected to pursue that narrow and blind and selfish and utterly destructive course, for great creditor and surplus-reproducing nations, of neglecting or abandoning any real purpose to develop our international, commercial, and financial relations, with the result inevitably that we have fallen upon evil days.

When this panic broke, and it was a natural outcome whenever a country refuses to exchange surpluses with every other country, when every nation was indulging in futile and foolish attempts to create surpluses and push them out on other countries, but at the same time refusing to let any other country push its surplus back on it, even when it was mutually agreeable and profitable for it to be done—nothing was more inevitable that soon we would have a flood of production everywhere.

As soon as that occurred the manufacturers slowed down in their purchase of raw material. Then the price of raw materials began to fall. Then the purchasing power decreasing, the price of foodstuffs began to fall, and finally they experienced a decline of prices. That is what occurred during recent years.

The great speculative era in the stock markets in 1928 and 1929 was a symptom of this deep-seated disease which sooner or later would burst upon the world with all its devastating afflictions. The collapse in the stock market precipitated a world-wide dislocation of all prices and exchange and trade, and started the perpendicular fall of commodity prices.

Mr. President, just to indicate what had happened let me take another glance at some statistics. Here is a statement prepared by the Bureau of Economics, Department of Agriculture. It is headed "Foreign Tariffs and Other Restrictions of Imports of Agricultural Products." I wish to read a paragraph of it, and shall then ask permission to insert the balance in the RECORD:

> As the result of intensification of the spread of economic nationalism throughout the world since the war, there has been a great increase of trade barriers against imports of agriculture, as of other products.

Then they describe in some detail all the phases of high and still higher tariffs, of prohibitions of various kinds, of quotas, of government permits and licenses and pretended sanitary regulations, of enactments fixing minimum amounts that might be imported, and a long list of others, with the result that scarcely a more conclusive explanation of the tremendous slump in agricultural exports from this country could be offered than is set forth in this document.

Our friends who espouse the other and opposing economic course seem to have an idea that when we bring the agencies of Congress and other departments of Government into operation to shut out a few dollars of imports here and there which are trickling into the United States in the way of specialties or novelties or something of the sort, that we are accomplishing some sound and profitable economic purpose. And yet no economic truth is more patent than that whenever we to-day shut out one dollar of imports by these extreme obstructions which we are undertaking to erect from time to time we shut in at least $5 worth of automobiles and foodstuffs and machinery and other surpluses in all industrial and productive lines, including wheat and cotton.

What boots it if a few dollars' worth of oil comes in to some bay or some harbor or locally on the seaboard, if we are able in return to send out and sell five times that value in surplus cotton or wheat or automobiles or these other enormous surpluses which are binding down so heavily and almost hopelessly depressing our entire economic situation? Yet wherever and whenever on both oceans somebody finds where a few dollars of imports are trickling in, he catches the first train, or perhaps does not wait that long but gets on an airship, and comes through to Washington overnight in his haste to put up demands to the Federal Government by legislation to shut out these trivial imports.

What have we brought upon ourselves? I say to Senators that we may postpone the real causes of our panic trouble, we may attempt to shunt aside or push forward the basic cause that underlies a hopelessly chaotic condition, financially and commercially and industrially, that confronts this and other countries; but finally, tragic as it may be, enough additional millions of wage earners will be thrown into unemployment and enough additional farmers and business men will be driven into bankruptcy to finally compel politicians and statesmen everywhere to brush aside these minor, superficial, and temporary remedies with which we have been dealing for months and come down to a real consideration of the fundamentals of our industrial and economic situation as the postwar period has presented it.

It is little wonder that nothing substantial has been done thus far to relieve panic conditions. When the panic occurred in October, 1929, it was not recognized as a panic by the Hoover administration. It was treated as a gentle zephyr, a purely surface disturbance growing out of some speculation in the New York stock market that would soon blow over. The administration consumed a full year in diagnosing and in finally identifying the true nature and extent of this unprecedented panic. Naturally, in its devastating effects it had gone a long distance. But even then, Mr. President, there was no thought or purpose seriously to analyze the true cause and deal with it. The first step that was taken was the moratorium. That was to compose a little financial and business whirlwind that had started up in central and southeastern Europe, through fear that it might ultimately reach this country. That fear was well founded and illustrates one of five hundred methods by which this and other countries are hopelessly interdependent in an economic sense.

The moratorium was to compose the panic situation and remedy it, but instead it swept by with no tangible result except very momentarily. Following that was organized over here the bankers' pool, which was going to inspire confidence and deal adequately with this purely temporary and superficial business depression, as it was then called. The bankers' pool got nowhere. Then was started the railroad-corporation arrangement, and that got nowhere. Finally was taken up the Federal reconstruction finance remedy—not basically a remedy but a temporary first-aid proposition to restore confidence and keep some business concerns out of receiverships. That has not materially, in any general sense, affected the panic situation.

Then the Federal reserve system, finally, as a last effort to deal with the panic situation, entered upon a protracted period of open-market operations. So far that has not gotten anywhere in the way of affording tangible results of a widely beneficial nature.

Mr. President, we have been in the welter of this awful chaotic industrial and business panic for two and a half years. Not a semblance of the fundamentals of these conditions has been presented, and there is no plan or purpose or effort thus far, so far as I know, to present it; but, on the contrary, we sit here refusing the slightest international cooperation that would even be acceptable to the blindest isolationist who could be found in this country. We have kept entirely away upon the theory that we here by ourselves, by boot-strap methods alone, can lift this Nation up to that high level of commodity prices, to restored production, and to sound commercial and general business conditions that we have a right to expect of this great people, while all the other nations remain helpless and prostrate on a low plane of commodity prices and general business, and of collapsed exchanges, of unbalanced budgets, and crippled in every other financial and economic way, improvement in which is vital and indispensable to suitable recovery.

It is my judgment, Mr. President, that that is an impossibility. We can make some progress; we can make considerable progress in a temporary and more or less artificial manner, but nothing is more absurd than to say, "I can take my wheat over to the Chicago market and sell it tomorrow morning without waiting until Liverpool is heard from," or "I can take my cotton to New Orleans and sell it without waiting until the market news is received from London."

Mr. President, commodity prices have been pulled down and held down to the world level in every instance where they are bought and sold in world markets and where they are produced on a surplus basis by any particular country. I desire to call attention to the facts, in order to illustrate where we have gotten after this long string of so-called remedies that have been set forth by the administration in charge of the Government. As an illustration for my friends who imagine that they can single out different surplus-producing industries and by the imposition of tariffs lift the prices up ad libitum, let me refer to wheat and sugar, on both of which tariff duties are imposed; to hides, having a tariff; to rubber, which has no tariff; to silk, which has no tariff; to cocoa, which has no tariff; to copper, which has no tariff; to zinc, which has a tariff; to silver and petroleum, which have no tariff protection. Those are 10 commodities of world use, many of which this country itself produces a surplus of. According to the index of wholesale prices, these 10 raw materials on May 16, 1932, had registered a new low all-time price level. Zinc, Mr. President, on which there has been a tariff from the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, went to 2.38, an all-time low price. Whether we take hides or corn or wheat or oats or rye, zinc or lead, or any other products, of which a substantial surplus is produced and which are commodities of world use, no lesson has been more conclusively learned by intelligent fair-minded people everywhere than that such tariffs mean nothing, or practically nothing, but they do have this effect——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I understand—and I recognize the Senator from Tennessee as being one of our leading Democratic torchbearers——

Mr. HULL. I am not entitled to that distinction, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I myself fought under the banner that the Senator carried for a number of years. I desire to ask is the Senator standing against all tariffs?

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the Senator that I am expecting to discuss at some length the President's veto message as I proceed and I will deal exactly with that phase of the subject.

Mr. LONG. Inasmuch as the Senator mentioned oil, I thought possibly he was including that in his remarks. Perhaps I am out of place if the Senator is not discussing particularly the oil tariff, so I will not ask the question I had in mind.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, the interruption of the Senator was very timely because it reminded me of the terrifically destructive effect of useless tariffs and trade obstructions. When we run up our tariffs, whether they are effective or not, most of the other nations of the world immediately, either through retaliation or our leadership, proceed to run their tariffs up even higher, with the result that to-day the nations of the world are hopelessly bound up and tied down with every sort of restrictions and restraints upon trade and commerce, and with all kinds of retaliatory and reprisal agencies that it has been possible to conjure up and place in operation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I am not disputing, for the sake of argument, at least, that perhaps it might not be advisable in some instances or in many instances to bring about reductions in tariffs, but the question I wish to ask is does the Senator believe that the few industries which have no tariff should have none at all while all other tariffs remain, or should the industries which now have no tariffs not have some?

Mr. HULL. If the Senator will wait until I reach the discussion of the pending bill, I will come to that. I am trying to deal with some general conditions and policies. In other words, Mr. President, as I stated at the outset I am, perhaps vainly, trying to attract the attention of some of my colleagues to the basic conditions which the panic presents, in the hope that I may then enlist their cooperation in working out basic remedies, instead of and in lieu of this long list of purely temporary and artificial and makeshift first-aid remedies which have been put in operation and which I have recited in some detail.

For instance, take the price of corn on which there is a tariff of 25 cents a bushel and which is a world-wide commodity. On the farms on April 15, 1932, it was selling for 31.4 cents a bushel. The price of wheat was 43.1 cents a bushel, with a tariff of 42 cents a bushel upon it. The price of eggs has gone down to 10.2 cents; the price of chickens has gone down to 12.6 cents; the price of butter, with 14 cents a pound tariff, has gone down to 20.1 cents, which is the lowest price for butter in 25 years. Hogs in Chicago are selling as low as 3.53 cents a pound which is the lowest price in 30 years. Hides are down to 5¾ cents, 56 per cent off from 1929, and oats just a few months ago were down to 11 cents on the farm.

I merely mention these commodities, Mr. President. I am not attempting to make a tariff argument here with respect to any particular commodity, but I am seeking to impress in the minds of my colleagues, to the extent of my small ability, the fact that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the commodities of world use that are produced on a substantial exporting basis by a nation, especially if it is a great creditor nation like ours, can not hope to secure any tangible or certain tariff benefits.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. HULL. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HULL. It is no interruption.

Mr. TYDINGS. But something has just come into my hand in line with what the Senator has been saying, and I thought, if he is familiar with it, that he would welcome the interruption. It is only under the circumstances that I venture to interrupt his very logical and fine address. As the Senator knows, hearings are now being held by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and on May 16 a communication was sent to the Committee on Ways and Means. Has the Senator mentioned that?

Mr. HULL. I have not done so as yet.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator going to do so?

Mr. HULL. I am expecting to mention it.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator is going to deal with it, I will not inject it at this point.

Mr. HULL. I will be very glad if the Senator will read it when I get a little farther along in my address.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HULL. With pleasure.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is true, is it not, that the tariff retaliation to which the able Senator from Tennessee has referred has been particularly pronounced since the enactment of the tariff act of 1930?

Mr. HULL. That is undoubtedly true. It has become more aggravated from month to month. The tariff act referred to has proven utterly disastrous to our trade as well as to our relationship with other countries. The truth is that American trade has almost been outlawed. Even our cousins across the water and our neighbors just to the north of us are soon assembling at Ottawa, with all the other great autonomous countries composing the British Empire, which have been such wonderful customers of this country, in a spirit of deep-seated feeling and resentment at the overt injury inflicted upon them by this country through wholly unnecessary economic policies.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We are, therefore, in a position in which any action we may take on the tariff should be considered with exceptional care if we are concerned over the agricultural, industrial, and commercial recovery of the United States.

Mr. HULL. There is not the slightest doubt about the accuracy and the timeliness of that view. I say, Mr. President, that it is tragical that the President of the United States saw fit to interpose his veto of the tariff bill passed by the two Houses of Congress during the present session. I am still more surprised to observe the so-called reasons on which the President rests his disapproval of that measure. In the first place, with all due respect to the high office he holds, he proceeds to indulge in utter sophistry by making a statement like this:

> My first objection to the bill is the misimpression and uncertainty it may convey as to its purpose. If the purpose of the proponents of this act is to secure lower tariffs on the 35 per cent of our imports which are not on the free list—

And so forth, and so forth. The idea conveyed is that our present tariff system lets into this country a great flood of imports that ordinarily would be extremely damaging and ordinarily would submerge almost all of our industries here at home but that we are able to resist them and that the wicked Democrats in Congress are disposed to let down the bars as to this little remnant of 35 per cent of imports that now are subject to duty.

Mr. President, that, of course, is not understood by the average layman; but the best answer that can be easily understood is that if the present skyscraping rates of tariffs had been made just a little bit higher on the 35 per cent of dutiable imports now coming in, even most of them would have been obstructed and shut out, with the result that instead of 65 per cent of free imports we would have to-day perhaps 99 per cent. In other words, it is just as easy to prescribe prohibitive tariff walls as to 99 per cent of the competitive imports, leaving all those we do not produce in this country free to come in, and call that an immense concession in tariff making, as it is to pursue the other policy; and there is the wholly misleading phase of the President's statement.

For instance, in 1928 the free crude materials brought in here were $1,220,000,000. The dutiable ones were $244,000,000. We brought in raw silk and rubber and hides and petroleum that were not dutiable, and we brought in some tobacco and some wool, of which we did not produce enough here at home, and some precious stones that we did not produce at all at home, and some oil seed that we did not produce in sufficient quantity, comprising most of the $244,000,000 of dutiable commodities, in contrast with the silk and rubber and other importations that are not produced at all in this country. Yet these figures are taken up and switched around in such a way as most unfairly and inaccurately to make it appear that there is some significance in the mere naked, unexplained statement that only 35 per cent of our imports are dutiable.

Of course, so long as we import a vast amount of rubber, silk, tin, coffee, tea, cocoa, and other commodities that we do not produce, and maintain virtual embargo tariffs on all commodities even remotely or speculatively competitive, it is inevitable that there would be 35 per cent or less of scattering and sporadic items filtering into this country. So that is an argument and a condition entirely the reverse of what the President was indicating.

I might follow this through in the case of free crude materials to the amount of $431,000,000, including bananas, coffee, tea, and these other commodities we do not produce, while there is only $118,000,000 dutiable, and it included things of which we do not produce enough as a rule; and so on through the list which I will not consume the time of the Senate to read.

The second point the President makes is as to tariff protection. He says:

> As a matter of fact there never has been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was more essential to the welfare of the American people than at present.

What in the world will be announced next from the White House? That sentence by itself was an impertinence in this sort of a state paper, which, I must say, contains more of sophistry and more of misstatement than any state paper since 1789. This sounds more like a fat-frying veto than a veto based on any sort of economic consideration. It sounds as if an election was approaching and an appeal to the pocketbooks of the chief tariff beneficiaries might be advisable.

Who is in more need of tariffs in this country than ever before? Is it the automobile people—one of the greatest industries in the Nation, shipping and selling their machines in every part of the world until world tariffs in retaliation shut them out and forced them back here at home, where the industry lies almost prostrate?

Is it the wheat industry? We have a duty of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and we are selling our surplus abroad and taking our chances.

Is it the machinery industry, which had been accustomed to selling in 55 nations, until they were shut out by trade obstructions, largely in retaliation for our own conduct?

Is it the fountain-pen manufacturers?

Is it any of the adding-machine people?

Is it the great cotton textile industry, which is selling its fabrics in 60 nations of the world?

Is it the machine-tool industry, exporting everywhere, that is needing tariffs?

In other words, upon what possible theory did the President conjure up a notion that this country to-day was never in such need of tariffs? The truth is that we have to-day a wall that is higher by far than any known to the fiscal history of this Government. Nearly 80 per cent of the customs duties to-day are derived from tariff items that carry an average rate of at least 60 to 65 per cent at the customhouse.

Here is the flax and hemp schedule, which averages over 50 per cent.

Here is the cotton textile schedule, which averages 58 per cent.

Here is the silk schedule, which averages 70 per cent; the woolen schedule, which averages 71 per cent; and a long list of others, all of them up in those high ranges never before equaled in this country.

Why, you would think that a great, uncontrollable flood of imports of textiles, iron, steel, agricultural, and all other competitive products was pouring into this Nation and largely responsible for the awful conditions that afflict the American public. Yet I call attention to the fact that the imports for April, 1932, were only $127,000,000, or less than one-third of the imports for 1927 or 1928 or 1929.

Some one suggests, however, that there is a difference in values and not such a great difference in the quantity of these imports. That gives me the opportunity to impress upon Senators the fact that the American producer is interested in prices rather than quantities. It matters not to the American producer about quantities, as is so well illustrated by the present vast surplus on his hands. It is the price that interests the American producer, whether it be an import or an export, or any other phase of our economic situation that is involved.

Our exports, on the other hand, as I have indicated, are now running at the rate of $1,632,000,000 a year, compared with almost four times that amount in a number of former years.

The President insists that we should direct our attention to more tariffs, notwithstanding this situation; and, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] very timely suggested, the President is contradicted in his view by the report of the Tariff Commission on the effect of depreciated currencies abroad as they relate to imports into this country. They reported that no additional tariffs such as were being proposed over in the House were either necessary or advisable. So that pretext for blind and sweeping tariff increases on this account has been eliminated by the action of the Tariff Commission itself.

The President goes farther and refers to the retention of the flexible tariff clause. At the time this clause was enacted I called attention in a speech in the House to the significance of this flexible-tariff policy and the effect of the proposed enactment of the present law in the following language:

I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the tariff act and demand its speedy repeal. I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic king.

Mr. President, unless and until the executive department can make permanent the policy of the present Tariff Commission law, with its flexible provision, Congress can lay claim to some semblance of its taxing power under the Constitution, but I deny the right of the executive department practically to assume, to arrogate to itself the chief power of tariff taxation in this country, while it ignores the great law-making body charged with that function and duty under the language of the Constitution.

The President dismisses this entire industrial and domestic trade situation, as it relates to tariffs, by the flippant remark that the Tariff Commission, through the operation of the flexible provision, will be amply able to raise or lower a tariff in response to all the sound needs and demands of industry and commerce in this country, both domestic and international.

There is an issue sharply presented as to whether this hand-picked high-tariff commission, under the domination of the President, who, at the same time, shows an amazing subserviency to the chief tariff beneficiaries of this country, shall be vested with the chief control of tariff making. I am opposed to it, and I believe that the sober second thought of the American people will repudiate this unprecedented and unusual and wholly unjustifiable arrogation of power and authority to the President.

He proceeds a little farther by the Smoot-Hawley Act; and I want to say that if I had my way, I would offer a bill to abolish the present rather partisan Tariff Commission and seek the installment of a broad, impartial, fact-finding organization. I would repeal the flexible provision and restore to the Congress its rightful authority in tariff making.

That would include a somewhat different or modified formula from that which our Republican friends have pretended to utilize for more than a generation. They have sought, and some of our Democratic friends have been more or less misled, by that limited and narrow and wholly inefficient formula called the difference in the costs of production at home and abroad.

The truth was that our Republican friends in charge of the Government did not permit any yardstick for tariff measurement until they were kicked and driven into it in 1904, and then they casually threw out this idea about the difference between the costs of production here and abroad. They used that with different variations, not in actual practice but merely for campaign purposes, for a number of years. They finally abandoned it for a time, but more recently they have fallen back to the pretended observance of that plan.

The truth is that the difference in costs of production here and abroad is just one factor of several vital, governing, controlling facts and factors in ascertaining the relative competitive strength of different countries. Not only that, but there is no earthly way, as a rule, to determine the facts as to the differences in production costs here and abroad. That has been tried out in vain, with a result that we see our Republican friends brushing aside tariff commissions and fact-finding agencies, as when they drafted and enacted the Fordney-McCumber tariff law. We see them brushing aside and ignoring so-called fact-finding agencies which would develop differences in production costs, as when they drafted and enacted the Smoot-Hawley law, and again when they insert one of the provisions of the pending bill.

The truth is, Mr. President, that we should have due regard for all pertinent facts and factors, and not depend upon the impossible proposition of ascertaining the costs of production here and abroad.

I notice in the report of the present Tariff Commission that in nearly every one of the last bunch of reports they made to the President recommending increases in several instances, they bluntly stated that it was not expedient or convenient to ascertain the foreign costs, so they availed themselves of this new provision of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, to take the invoice prices here at home and infer foreign costs. The result is that they can hire a bunch of clerks to glance at the invoice prices of a thousand commodities in a week, and infer the foreign costs, and make recommendations to the President. That is the slipshod manner I fear in which this commission is largely functioning.

Mr. President, some people imagine that we can have really scientific tariff revision by merely installing a commission here and taking the tariff segment by segment, or schedule by schedule, and placing it on a high and scientific level of revision. But I say, Mr. President, that that is not the governing question in connection with the whole problem of dealing with tariffs and tariff making. The real question goes farther back than that. The question is whether a political party in charge of the Government receives substantial campaign contributions from the tariff beneficiaries. Whenever it is permitted to receive such contributions, those beneficiaries sweep down here on Washington, and brush aside, and kick aside, if necessary, all agencies or obstructions, and write their own embargo rates.

There will be no sound or wholesome tariff legislation in this country until a divorce is effected between politics and vested interests, and we have been sitting here all winter and all spring talking about the superficial and temporary palliatives, and about how the Tariff Commission might function, about scientific tariff revision, but this, the real seat of the trouble has scarcely been mentioned, if at all. That presents one of the real issues in connection with the President's veto message.

Some of our Democratic and Republican friends imagine we are living 50, 75, or 100 years ago, when the academic question of whether one stands for an ultra high tariff or for moderate tariff or for revenue tariff or for free-trade tariff would become pertinent and timely. The truth is that at this stage of development of our commerce and our tariff and our politics, the chief beneficiaries have a strangle hold on the dominant forces in the Republican Party, and they come here as stated and write their own prohibitive tariffs. The question and the task for those who favor moderate tariffs instead of high and still higher tariffs from year to year is to organize themselves together, whether they be moderate protectionists, or tariff-for-revenue advocates, or free-trade advocates, and make the common fight on this condition to which I have referred. Until they succeed in divorcing and separating the chief beneficiaries of this phase of special privilege and that branch of politics in control of the Government, no other step can be successfully taken. It is idle and futile to talk about any other step.

Mr. President, I was greatly surprised to see President Hoover take issue with our proposal for an international conference on the economic situation. I was also surprised to see him take issue on the plain and reasonable proposal for reciprocal commercial treaties based on mutual tariff concessions.

Mr. President, these three methods of approaching this complicated domestic and international tariff and trade situation have been thoroughly established and approved by all of the ablest and most disinterested economic authorities in every important country.

The President undertakes to make a wholly erroneous impression that the international conference proposed in the vetoed bill is intended to usurp some of the tariff-making power of this Nation. Nothing is more absurd than that intimation. Nothing was farther from the minds of the Members of Congress in dealing with that matter.

I wish for just a moment to call attention to what was really in the minds of those who were in charge of that measure. Speaking of these three proposals embodied in the tariff bill which the President vetoed, in a recent speech I said this:

> The first proposal to this end is for legislation authorizing a permanent world economic conference called by the President, the action of which, more than any other first step, would restore confidence and credit, such conference having for its purposes the development of a spirit of simultaneous tariff revision downward, and liberal commercial policy, mutual agreements eliminating many discriminations in commerce, unshackling international finance, credit and exchange, and liberalizing the network of reprisals, prohibitions, embargoes, and other restraints which accompany the policy of superprotection.
> Second, legislation authorizing the President to negotiate trade agreements based upon mutual tariff concessions and the unconditional most-favored-nation doctrine.
> Third, that the American Congress, with the legislative bodies of other countries acting as nearly in concert as they will, should, according to their own separate and independent judgments, proceed with all necessary preliminary preparations, with the aid on the part of our Congress of an impartial fact-finding commission, for the careful and gradual readjustment downward of existing excessive tariffs with a level of moderate rates that will not permit conditions of domestic price monopoly, and a liberal, fair, and friendly commercial policy as the ultimate objectives. This broad policy would, in addition to impregnable home markets, insure wider and better foreign markets for our surplus, healthier domestic industry, and regular employment at suitable wages for all of our labor. I myself would reorganize the present tariff commission, repeal the flexible clause, and adopt a more modified formula for assembling all the facts and factors relating to competitive strength here and elsewhere.

There, Mr. President, is a frank statement of the purely innocent scope and purpose of the international conference proposed in this recent enactment.

All the nations of the world are afflicted with many conditions in common. All have experienced a common falling of commodity prices. All have experienced alike a collapse of credit and undue restrictions of the exchange situation, a hopelessly dislocated financial condition, with resulting monetary instability. All the nations are equally interested in restoring the structure of international trade, now prostrate. All are interested in bringing back to a higher level the commodity price situation. Yet, Mr. President, while every respectable business man and economic authority in the world to-day agrees that the controlling causes of this panic have now extended themselves to every important country, and that the necessity for some degree of cooperation is patent to every intelligent person, if we are to make satisfactory progress back to a stable and sound business recovery, the President flippantly and carelessly and recklessly vetoes this proposition, upon the absurd suggestion that the international economic conference would interfere with our domestic tariff policy.

Why, Mr. President, after all countries under our leadership have raised their tariffs to such heights that they have choked international trade down to its knees, some step to check this constant increase upward is necessary. No plan would be more practical than that of concerted action among all the countries of any importance to the end that they may, as nearly simultaneously as possible, through their domestic parliaments revise tariffs downward in the direction of a moderate level and to the end that the nations of the world may by mutual agreement eliminate many of the retaliatory and unfair trade methods and trade practices which are so conducive to trade strife and declarations of economic war. Of course, we could not get all of them to meet in a 40-acre lot to conduct negotiations to revise tariffs. Who would have thought of such a suggestion except some advisor of the President?

We propose bilateral treaties or treaties negotiated between two countries to revise tariffs downward in a spirit of mutual concession. If after a nation should negotiate half a dozen or more with other nations, they should all meet together and see fit to merge them into a multilateral treaty, and it was mutually acceptable in every way, they might do that. But that is as near as the President's sweeping condemnation of this provision comes to the truth. No American citizen could reasonably take exception upon the ground that it remotely interferes with the fullest prerogatives of the American Government and the American Congress.

Mr. President, I predict—and I call each Senator to witness this prediction, which is a thing I do not often indulge in—that the present indescribable conditions of panic which are causing such acute distress and suffering throughout the Nation and throughout the world will grow fundamentally worse and will be utterly impossible of successful treatment until the heads of the enlightened commercial nations of the world come together in an economic conference to consider these joint and irrevocably interrelated and intertwined credit and financial and exchange and trade conditions, which include the collapse of the commodity-price situation, which include the unstable monetary situation, and a number of other vitally complex and almost insoluble financial and economic problems which have the nations of the world chained down under the awful effect of this accumulation and culmination of unsound financial and economic practices and methods over recent years.

We may postpone the day by diverting our attention to these temporary palliatives, as I have said, by regaling ourselves with tariff proposals for every Tom, Dick, and Harry who feels himself aggrieved and hurries on to Washington for relief. We may regale ourselves by further temporary tonics, such as those which have been suggested as first-aid treatments in the past. But in the end this surplus-producing and creditor nation will be driven and kicked into the position of responding to the unerring economic law that applies to the postwar economic condtions which came to it, whether we would have them do so or not.

I am speaking as loudly to the American people as one humble individual in this body could undertake to speak when I warn the 30,000,000 farm population, when I warn the 28,000,000 wage earners and their families, when I warn every legitimate business man in the country that unless they kick and club politicians into a consideration of the basic problems and the basic remedies, we are doomed to flounder along from bad to worse.

Mr. President, another portion of this veto related to the timely and perfectly wholesome and innocent proposal for reciprocal commercial agreements based on mutual tariff concessions. We have had commercial treaties in the past, but the President brushes the entire matter aside with the suggestion that they have not been altogether successful. The truth is that the President makes a wholly one-sided construction of the proposal. He arbitrarily assumes that the bill proposes reciprocal commercial treaties based on the conditional instead of the unconditional favored-nation doctrine.

The truth is the matter was left entirely open. The Government to-day and since 1923 has been pretending to pursue the unconditional favored-nation doctrine in all its commercial relations and practices with other countries. So instead of raising any controversy, our bill simply inserted the authority to negotiate commercial treaties, leaving to the executive department the function of negotiating them on the unconditinal or the conditional favored-nation basis as it saw fit, but we assumed it would be upon the present policy of the Government which rests on the favored-nation doctrine in its unconditional form.

In the face of that fact the bill is sent back to us with a careless and what appears to me to be a reckless veto, with the wholly unfounded assumption that the bill only contemplated treaties based on the conditional favored-nation policy. That is about as accurate as the other objections and the other constructions placed upon the measure by our distinguished President.

Mr. President, this Nation is not in a position longer to pursue archaic and antiquated pre-war economic policies. The most fatal mistake of our leadership was in failing to interpret, as I said on a former occasion, the wholly transformed economic conditions which followed the World War, and apply sound and wholesome modernized policies to them.

Some of our friends discuss all these tariff policies as though we were still back in the pre-war period. I desire to reaffirm the statement that I might not heretofore have made as fully as I intended to the effect that the first issue which presents itself to-day is whether the forces opposed to this policy of skyscraping tariffs, constantly increased at the expense and under the direction of the beneficiaries themselves, shall be checked, and this Nation, leading all others, face back in the opposite direction. All opponents, regardless of their various tariff views, can with utmost consistency unite and wage this fight until the movement is checked and a reasonable revision is made back to a level of moderation. Then will be ample time for individuals of the opposition to get together and indulge in hairsplitting discussions as to their various shades of tariff notions. Then will be a still further change in our economic situation and ample time will be offered. But to-day, in my judgment, no person who believes in moderate protection or tariff for revenue or free trade or in any other shade of tariff economies than these impossibly high embargo levels can escape the responsibility to unite and let this fight be waged.

Mr. President, the present pending proposal, as I said a while ago, relates to more international commodities.

The projection of proposals at this time for tariffs on oil, which, of course, will increase prices so far as oil is concerned, if seriously intended by its proponents, I think is subject to genuine criticism. I have the greatest respect for every Senator on this floor and for his intellectual views, and never so long as I remain here would I intentionally impugn anyone's motives or question his fullest right and privilege to think and act and vote as his judgment might suggest. But, Mr. President, there has been a peculiar phase connected with this pending measure as it relates to its subject matter. I can not escape the suspicion that the Hoover administration is really as much or more concerned to bring about a disruption and a rift in the Democratic Party here in Congress than it is to secure what purports to be urgent relief for the Treasury; and yet that seems incredible, for the administration has seen develop the greatest deficit in the peace-time history of any nation. It has seen the credit of the Government strained almost to the breaking point, with bonds down as low as 86. So it does appear incredible, on the one hand, that the administration would not be placing the speedy enactment of this internal revenue bill as it relates to internal-revenue taxes proper before all other considerations and wish to see it pass through the Congress with the utmost dispatch in order to save the credit of the Government. Yet I see the administration suggest on the one hand that both public and private credit requires speedy passage of this internal-revenue measure, and then, upon the other hand, I see the administration sit still and remain mute while its spokesmen in this Congress, headed by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], are swift to aid in projecting and in injecting these wholly outside, extraneous, trouble-breeding, controversial tariff items which are intended still further to obstruct international trade and thereby depress our business situation and our credit situation.

I am bewildered in my efforts to fathom the real state of mind and the real purpose of those who are cooperating behind my colleagues here in diverting attention from the passage of this internal-revenue measure, for a more or less indefinite time, while we enjoy the delectable spectacle of tariff trading, logrolling, trafficking, and wirepulling in a manner that would not do any particular credit to a county court or to the lowest branch of some local legislative body.

I am wondering, Mr. President, after the Democrats have given their full cooperation during this period of stress at the Treasury and in every part of the Nation, why those in charge of and responsible for this awful Treasury deficit condition are willing to undertake to project strife and division into the Democratic Party instead of expressing some appreciation of the cooperation we were giving in our efforts to help them speed through this urgent tax bill. I have never seen such far-fetched efforts to conceal the real nature of a tariff transaction. In the first place, these tariff items are called tax items. That is the first time I ever heard Republicans call a tariff a tax. We have gotten that much of a concession.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. If I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator on that point, I desire to say that some of our Republican friends from the New England coast objected to this oil tax in the House of Representatives upon the novel ground that it would raise the price of the commodity as well as on the ground of its being called a tax.

Mr. HULL. We are rapidly being driven to a reexamination of tariff, trade, and other economic policies. If the Democratic Party does not organize itself behind a policy of moderation, one that will oppose the present policy of the extremist, and does not fight for it, I predict that our New England Republican friends and other Republican friends throughout the country will be driven to adopt the Democratic policy of moderation and liberal trade methods within the next five years.

We hear some of our good Democratic friends going about talking about the oil "excise tax." That, of course, is a misnomer, and everybody knows it is a misnomer. And the great Senator from Utah rose solemnly in his seat on yesterday to echo the phrase "an excise tax on oil," and fished out of his pocket some imaginary or real or some sort of cooked-up figures which purported to come from some unauthorized agency showing estimates of revenue to be derived. The Senator from Utah presided over the Committee on Finance, but at no time to my knowledge did he divulge these belated figures that some subordinate at the Tariff Commission must have prepared. None of the members of the committee, so far as I know, were made acquainted with the existence of any figures except what the Treasury itself O. K'd and those figures placed this collection of tariff items on a virtually embargo basis.

That is what I complain of, Mr. President. This is largely an embargo proposition. A 20 per cent tax on some commodities at the customhouse is just as much an embargo as a 200 per cent tax on certain other commodities. I object to having embargo tariff items placed in this emergency revenue bill. And when, after the Treasury had consulted the ablest expert on minerals in the Commerce Department and secured his estimate, which showed a possible revenue of $5,000,000—which is a mere nominal amount for oil imports—and the Treasury approved it and the Senator from Utah, as chairman of the committee, signed his name to the committee report approving it, I become suspicious of the political side of this situation. For some unexplained and unexplainable reason the distinguished Senator from Utah suddenly projected himself into the discussion here yesterday afternoon and amazed all of us who were in the dark about the matter by bringing out a mass of so-called estimates from some utterly unauthorized source.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has referred to some political side of this question and has also made reference to me. I am perfectly unfamiliar with any such thing, and do not know what he is driving at. I will wait until I see just what he has said before making any reply.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD certain documents which I have here relating to international trade restrictions and other phases of international commercial practices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The documents referred to are as follows:

FOREIGN TARIFFS AND OTHER RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Foreign government restrictions on imports of agricultural products are so numerous and so varied in type that it is possible in a memorandum on the subject only to indicate some of the main types and to give illustrations intended to convey some qualitative idea of their nature and extent. The most important forms of restrictions are: (1) Protective tariffs; (2) prohibitions, import contingents or quotas, and government permits or licenses; (3) government importing or trading monopolies which follow a protective purchasing policy; and (4) legal enactments fixing minimum percentages of home-produced material to be used in domestic manufacture. All of these measures are designed either directly or indirectly to raise the domestic price by restricting the imported supply available in the home market, and they may be employed either singly or in combination to that end. Moreover, there are many restrictions of an indirect character whose effect, if not purpose, is to afford economic protection to domestic industry. Rules and standards regarding the method of packing, character of containers, etc., can be so formulated as to hamper or prevent importation. Sanitary regulations and quarantines can be imposed partially with a view to conferring economic protection. Commercial laws can be so drawn as to make difficult the operations of foreign importing firms and their representatives within the country. These, however, are but a few of the many possible devices that can be employed to restrict imports.

As a result of the intensification of the spirit of economic nationalism throughout the world since the war, there has been a great increase of trade barriers against imports of agricultural, as of other products. The creation of new states in Europe, together with a desire on the part of the older countries to strengthen their domestic agriculture as a means of promoting economic self-sufficiency, had already led to the restoration of high trade barriers before the present world crisis in agriculture. Immediately after the war there had been a brief period during which the severe war-time restrictions on trade in agricultural products in Europe were abated somewhat by reason of the emergency requirements of countries which had not yet had time to reorganize their domestic economy in the light of the drastic changes wrought by the war. This period had later been followed by one of increased protection to agricultural producers; but until the present international crisis developed this protection had for the most part taken the form of tariff increases, which nevertheless did not raise agricultural tariff levels much above those which had prevailed prior to the war.

The collapse of world prices in 1929 gave a new impetus to restriction. Within the past two years a great variety of protective measures for the purpose of relieving agriculture have come into existence throughout the world. In nearly all countries there have been marked increases in the duties on agricultural products. In Germany, to take an outstanding example, the policy of agrarian protectionism had probably been carried farther than in any other European country. Several times since the summer of 1929 the German import duties on cereals, meats, and other farm products have been increased, the German Government even having gone so far as to renounce some of its commercial treaties in order to do so. At the present time (April, 1931) a Government bill for still further drastic increases in the German duties on agricultural products is pending. Germany has not stopped, however, with tariff duties. Along with many other countries, she has been employing more direct methods of restriction of imports, of which more will be said in a moment. What has happened in Germany is roughly typical of what has occurred in many other countries. France, Italy, Switzerland, Poland, the Danubian States, Spain, Portugal, Canada, Chile, and Mexico, not to mention the United States and a number of other countries (including even Cuba, which is now attempting to diversify her agriculture), have all been increasing their tariffs on agricultural products; and most of them have also been employing other restrictive measures as well.

Perhaps the best rough indication of the tariff trend is to be had by reference to a single commodity of wide production and consumption, such as wheat. Since January, 1930, the German duty on wheat has been increased six times, having risen from 48.62 cents to $1.62 a bushel. Since July, 1925, the Italian duty has been increased from 39.4 cents to 86.67 cents a bushel. In January, 1927, the French duty was 19.56 cents a bushel. By May, 1929, it had been increased to 53.34 cents; and in May, 1930, it was further increased to 85.35 cents. Between January, 1930, and January, 1931, Greece increased her rate on wheat from 40 cents to 60 cents a bushel; Canada, from 12 cents to 35 cents; and Mexico, from 66 cents to 90 cents. As regards other cereals the story has been similar.

Some countries, such as Czechoslovakia, Austria, Sweden, New Zealand, and Chile, have resorted to sliding-scale tariffs on grain, which are graduated according to the price level, the duty being highest when the price is lowest, and vice versa. One country, Bolivia, has adopted a system of graduation only in one direction, namely, upward. A recent Bolivian law provides that the amount of the duty shall be increased annually over a period of years, at the end of which time importation is prohibited. Another country, Mexico, has made much shorter shrift of the matter. In March, 1931, Mexico placed complete prohibitions on imports of wheat and corn as a quarantine measure against introduction of certain plant diseases into the country.

An outstanding feature of the recent outcropping of new restrictive measures on imports is the marked importance which they have assumed in comparison with the older and more familiar device of tariff duties. Among these newer expedients, one of the most important has been the prescribing of the minimum percentage of the domestic product which shall be used in domestic manufacture. This device has been applied for the most part in connection with cereals. Some 10 or a dozen countries have enacted legislation stipulating the minimum percentage of domestic wheat or rye to be mixed with the imported product in milling. In August, 1929, for example, Germany fixed the ratio of domestic wheat to be used at 30 per cent. By July, 1930, she had increased it to 80 per cent, at which point it remained until January, 1931. A recent decision reduces the ratio to 75 per cent for February and March, 1931; to 65 per cent for April and May; and to 50 per cent for June and July. Other countries employing this device, together with the ratios which were in effect for wheat and/or rye, as of the latest date available, follow: Sweden, 80 for wheat and 95 for rye (millers maintaining a minimum price level for domestic grain, however, need use only 70 and 85 per cent, respectively); Czechoslovakia, 75 for wheat and 95 for rye; Latvia, 50 for wheat and 80 for rye; France, 90 for wheat; Peru, 30 for wheat; Estonia, 50 for rye; Greece, 10 for wheat. In the Netherlands a wheat bill is apparently about to become a law which, among other things, require that no less than 25 per cent of the wheat milled shall be domestic. On the whole, these milling regulations, in combination with other restrictive measures, have been very effective in maintaining domestic prices above the world level.

In many countries direct price fixing is practiced. As a rule, where this is the case the government exercises a monopoly over the grain trade. Price fixing, of course, rests in part upon regulation of imports, and the devices employed to this end have included not only tariffs and milling regulations, as indicated above, but other measures as well, such as licensing systems, quotas, or other forms of direct restriction. Switzerland, for example, through a grain-control board, fixes each year the amount of the added price to be paid for domestic as compared with foreign wheat and meets this fiscal burden through a small tax on other imports into the country. The Government requires that millers grinding imported wheat must purchase a stipulated portion of domestic wheat. Importation of flour, except by the Government, is prohibited. In Norway all trade in grain is handled by Government monopoly. The Government guarantees fixed prices for all domestic grain and directly limits imports in such manner as to maintain the price guaranty. In Estonia and Latvia a substantially similar system of price fixing, supported by rigid Government control of imports, is in effect.

In Sweden a price-fixing régime accompanied by control of milling quotas and by other protective legislation has been in operation since June, 1930. For a time it was based on a voluntary cooperative arrangement between the Ministry of Agriculture and the millers, under which the latter agreed that 45 per cent of all wheat and 50 per cent of all rye milled should be Swedish and that guaranteed minimum prices should be paid to Swedish grain farmers. From September, 1930, by the action of the state cereals commission, this arrangement became compulsory, except, of course, that there were subsequent changes in the milling ratios. Under the new arrangement the millers were to maintain, up to August 1, 1931, a guaranteed minimum price for domestic grain, the price being graduated upward each succeeding month in order to discourage congested marketing of grain at harvest time. Under this guaranty, prices rose to a maximum, at the end of the period, of $1.51 a bushel for wheat, and $1.20 a bushel for rye.

In Spain admission of all wheat and flour of foreign origin is prohibited so long as the price of domestic wheat does not rise above 53 pesetas per 100 kilos (equivalent at current exchange rates as of April, 1931, to $1.59 a bushel) during the period of one month. Thereafter imports may be brought in only with the consent of the Council of Ministers, after a report by the Minister of National Economy. With this legislation as a support, the Government on June 20, 1930, fixed minimum prices of first-grade wheat at from 46 to 48 pesetas (equivalent, at present exchange rates, to from $1.38 to $1.44 a bushel) and the maximum price at 53 pesetas per 100 kilos ($1.59 a bushel at present exchange rates).

In South Africa there is a cooperative arrangement between the Government and the millers, by which the wheat growers are guaranteed a minimum price for their product. Under the wheat importation restriction act of March 11, 1930, the Minister of Finance was authorized to prohibit, control, or regulate the importation of any class of wheat into the Union of South Africa. Since that time wheat has been imported only under Government permit. In order to protect the flour millers of the Union, as well as domestic wheat growers, the Government announced that, as a result of the assurance given by the flour millers of the Union, that they would guarantee wheat growers a minimum price of $1.69 a bushel for No. 1 wheat and $1.64 for No. 2, it (the Government) would introduce legislation in the session of Parliament opening on January 30, 1931, to prevent wheat flour from being imported at less than a landed cost of $9 per bag of 200 pounds. Thus a system of price-fixing substantially similar to that of Sweden has been developing in South Africa.

In Portugal the government controls all trade in grain. Importation is permitted only after the government has estimated the country's needs in excess of domestic supplies. The amount of wheat to be imported by each mill, once the total amount of imports to be permitted is determined, is fixed by the government on the basis of the mill's producing capacity. Unlike the foregoing countries, Portugal does not seem to have directly fixed prices by legislation; but it is obvious that she controls imports in such a way as to maintain domestic prices on an artificial level.

What has been said above concerning import restrictions on wheat and other grain serves to illustrate the trend with reference to all agriculture. In general, the trend has been toward increasing import restrictions for all agricultural products. On dairy products, meats, vegetables, fruits, as well as on cereals, duties have been increased until, in many countries, they are virtually prohibitive.

Take, for example, dairy products: On butter, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Cuba, Japan, Mexico, and Spain impose duties even higher than the United States duty of 14 cents a pound, the Brazilian duty of 25 cents a pound being the highest. On cheese, Australia, Brazil, Japan, Mexico, and Spain impose duties in excess of 10 cents a pound compared with the rate of 7 cents in the United States, Brazil again heading the list with a duty of 20 cents a pound. On condensed milk (in comparison with the duties of $1.80 to $2.75 per 100 pounds in the United States), Australia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Italy, and Turkey impose duties ranging from $5 to $10 per 100 pounds; Portugal, Rumania, Uruguay, and Venezuela, from $10 to $20 per 100 pounds; while in Spain, the duty is equivalent to $26 per 100 pounds, in Bulgaria to $48.63, and in Russia to $233 per 100 pounds (subject, however, to absolute control by the State trade monopoly).

Or again, take leaf tobacco. Australia, Colombia, Cuba, Egypt, Honduras, Irish Free State, Japan, Nicaragua, Russia, the United Kingdom, and Venezuela impose duties on leaf tobacco, ranging all the way from $1 to more than $5 a pound, as compared with the United States duty of 35 cents to 50 cents a pound. In addition, several important countries have state monopolies which either prohibit or greatly restrict the quantity of imports.

On meats the duties are similarly high. For example, on hams and shoulders, Turkey and Soviet Russia impose duties in excess of $70 per 100 pounds; Bulgaria, Chile, El Salvador, and Argentina, from $20 to $25 per 100 pounds; and Brazil, Yugoslavia, Uruguay, Norway, Mexico, Portugal, Rumania, and Czechoslovakia, from $10 to $20 per 100 pounds; whereas the United States duty is $3.25 per 100 pounds. On bacon, Turkey and Soviet Russia impose the same duties as on hams and shoulders, while Bulgaria, El Salvador, Chile, Mexico, Argentina, and Venezuela impose duties ranging from $10 to $20 per 100 pounds. It is noteworthy, however, that such countries as the United Kingdom, Irish Free State, Denmark, and Belgium admit all of these meat products free of duty.

On sugar, Austria, Brazil, Bulgaria, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Italy, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Rumania, Russia, El Salvador, Spain, Turkey, South Africa, and Venezuela impose duties in excess of $3 per 100 pounds, as compared with the very high United States duty against Cuba (which is the effective rate) of $2 per 100 pounds. Most of these countries have rates ranging from $3 to $6 per 100 pounds. Brazil, with a duty of $17.46; Italy, with $13.33; and Venezuela, with $10.28 per 100 pounds, head the list.

On dried fruits the story is similar. On raisins, for example, Chile imposes a duty of $22.09 per 100 pounds; Mexico, $13.97; El Salvador, $11.25; and Colombia, $10.40; Soviet Russia, 200 per cent; and Japan, 100 per cent ad valorem, as compared with the United States duty of $2 per 100 pounds. Since April 4, 1930, Australia has prohibited all such imports. On prunes the range of foreign duties is much the same as on raisins. On imports of certain fresh fruits some countries impose sanitary regulations which are highly restrictive. The British and Argentine regulations on apples are an illustration.

In the foregoing discussion no account is taken of government measures in aid of agriculture other than those which are designed to restrict imports. In the field of international trade there are, of course, also those which rest on regulation of exports, of which there are two main types—(1) restrictions on exports, such as export duties and embargoes, export monopolies, and export agreements, both of a national and an international character; and (2) measures designed to promote exports, such as export bounties and premiums, reduction or remission of domestic taxes on exported products, preferential transportation rates for export, and so on. One type of measure much discussed, of which nothing has been said herein, is the import-export certificate system employed by Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Sweden. This involves the issuance of certificates of a fixed value per unit of product exported, the certificate being redeemable only for payment of customs duties on imports of the same or of other specified products. In effect, these import certificates, issued to exporters of particular products specified in the law, are simply bounties to the exporters of those products; hence they do not properly fall within the scope of this memorandum.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, speaking individually, I have always been in favor of a course of moderation in dealing with abnormally high tariff and trade policies. In common with every intelligent person, I realize that this country has developed many of its industries in a somewhat hothouse manner. At the same time it has not been my view that, since we have become an exporting and a great trading nation, we should pursue that policy at all to the extent to which it has been pursued thus far. I think as a country like ours with its opportunities and resources becomes economically independent it should correspondingly throw off artificial restrictions and restraints and impediments. I set forth in detail my tariff formula in a speech some weeks ago.

For those of my political faith who espouse an ultra-high-tariff policy upon the theory that it is Democratic, I have no words of unkindness to offer; but I do say, Mr. President, that the two leading political parties to-day have their respective economic philosophies and they are either substantially the same or they differ to such an extent that it is easily possible for Democrats to fundamentally differentiate the Democratic economic policies from those of the dominant forces of the other side.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have not had the benefit of listening to the Senator's able address; but may I inquire, Is the Senator opposed to all tariffs upon all imports?

Mr. HULL. The Senator's question would not have been asked, I think, if he had been here, although he is perhaps fortunate to have been out much of the time.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I assume that the Senator believes in the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue?

Mr. HULL. The Senator again is unfortunate in not having been in the Chamber when I was discussing the subject at some length.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I appreciate that, of course; but may I put the inquiry in this form:

The Senator would favor a given tariff duty upon a given imported article if it were considered necessary to raise adequate revenue to carry on our Government; would he not?

Mr. HULL. The Senator still is unfortunate in not having been in the Chamber a while ago.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then I am assuming that the Senator is a thoroughbred Democrat, and believes in a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. HULL. The Senator will find in my remarks to-morrow morning, and also in many addresses during recent years, an elaboration of all phases of his inquiries. It is with the utmost respect that I do not undertake to detain the Senate to repeat what I have already said.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I shall avail myself of the great privilege of reading the Senator's remarks to-morrow, and, I know, receive much benefit from it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. KING. I think we concede the competency of the able Senator from California to judge who are thoroughbred Republicans; but, speaking for myself, I deny his qualifications to judge who are thoroughbred Democrats.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I rise merely to admit that I am a thoroughbred Republican. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, if embargo and typical Republican tariffs are supported by the recognized Democratic economic philosophy, then I am not a Democrat, and never have been a Democrat, and never expect to be a Democrat. I believe in tariff moderation. If embargo or high tariffs are part of the Democratic creed, it is the latter-day Democratic creed. It is not that of Jefferson and Madison, or of Tilden or Cleveland or Wilson. I must beg leave most emphatically to protest against a proposal further to commit the Democratic Party to such ultra-high-tariff ideas as would create in the minds of the American people the impression that there has been a virtual merger between the two outstanding political parties of this country with respect to tariffs and general economics.

There is no more powerful or vicious aggregation of so-called special privilege in this country than the chief tariff beneficiaries. With all due respect, if anyone should differ with me—and I am not sure that one would—I should consider it almost a burlesque to stand for this powerful citadel of special privilege, embodying tariff benefits to the extreme extent we witness to-day, and at the same time pretend that I was opposed to such minor groups of special privilege as power influences and other special-privilege organizations of that kind. I am hopeful that the time is here when there can be an organization of all the forces opposed to the policy of wild extremism that is sweeping this Nation and under American leadership sweeping the world out of one panic into another, and always along the road of unsound and temporary economic conditions.

I have, with the greatest respect, Mr. President, dealt with the principles which I think rule the policy that ought to be applied to the tariff items of the present bill. I have sought to remind my friends that the worst thing the matter with oil and with most other industries is panic conditions, in the first place, and they apply to all surplus-producing industries in every nation in the world. They apply, as I stated, to 25 raw material and foodstuff and manufacturing industries producing on a surplus scale in this country, half of them without tariffs. It is in those circumstances that I hope my colleagues will not feel called upon to vote embargo tariffs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator, during the course of his able speech, has made reference to these tariff duties provoking retaliation. May I call his attention to a communication which I received to-day from the Department of Commerce? It is to the effect that the Department of Commerce has received a cable from its commercial attaché in Lima, Peru, as follows:

A majority member of the Peruvian Congress has presented a bill providing an additional 300 per cent ad valorem import tax on American products.

I think that remarkable communication indicates the extent to which our export trade will suffer if we now proceed to levy the tariffs named in this bill.

Mr. HULL. That is a very significant communication, and only adds to a great many other similar dispatches.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have seen similar dispatches or statements in the press; so the other day I went over my correspondence of the time the act of 1922 was passed. I find that we had all kinds of threats from all parts of the world as to what would be done if the act of 1922 became a law; that retaliatory measures would be taken by those countries. I think there were a few that were sent to the committee through the State Department.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; but I am sure the Senator will agree that some of the threats made during the pendency of the recent tariff bill have been carried into effect by other governments.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do not think that was on account of the tariff bill. That came about on account of the absolute conditions existing in the world to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I know that the Senator from Utah and others are trying to cover themselves by relying upon the action being due to conditions in the world; but many of us are of the opinion that it was due to a determination to retaliate against the high duties imposed by the American Government upon imports from these various countries.

Mr. SMOOT. From all I can learn, the rates were increased in order to secure sufficient means to administer the various governments. If the Senator will take the time to get from the State Department the statements from those countries and the reports that were made upon them, he will see that the reports show that that is exactly what they had to raise the means in order to meet the expenses of their governments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I inquire of the Senator if he has seen the recent debate that took place in the Peruvian Congress, following the action by the House upon the duty upon oil and copper.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I have not seen any special quotations from the debate outside of a letter that I received from a person whose name I forget.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I should like to listen to this conversation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We are speaking about the debate that took place in the Peruvian Congress following the action by the House, and I asked the Senator from Utah if his attention had been called to it. Let me say, if the Senator has not read it, that such strong language was used that I hesitate to offer it for the RECORD. It is extremely vitriolic.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor. To whom is the Senator yielding?

Mr. HULL. The Senator from Utah had concluded, had he?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HULL. Just as soon as I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives published on May 17, 1932.

Mr. SMOOT. I have seen those hearings, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me call the Senator's attention to this statement, submitted to the committee by Mr. Castle of the State Department:

At the session of the constituent assembly of April 27, 1932, several Congressmen spoke of the serious situation which would occur in Peru should the United States Government apply a duty on copper imported into the United States.

Mr. José Manuel Tirado stated that should this measure be adopted, Peru should retaliate—

Not pass a revenue-producing measure—should retaliate at once by increasing its customs duties on United States products, principally on merchandise made from cotton—

And so forth.

So that it is not a revenue measure; it is a direct retaliation for this threatened tariff.

I do not want to take up the Senator's time; but already a decree in council has been issued by the Canadian Government, granting subsidies on Canadian coal directly because of the threat here to impose a tariff on those products mined in Canada.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HULL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Georgia has been in the Senate long enough and no doubt has followed the protests that have been made when tariff bills have been enacted by Congress closely enough to know that those protests have come every time a tariff bill has been before Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true, and that was the Senator's answer to the protests that were transmitted to the Finance Committee when we were considering the Smoot-Hawley Act; but those protests were made good, and they to-day stand against our imports in almost every principal country of the globe. I do not see how the Senator can think that the protests are idle. They certainly have actually materialized since the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Act.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of going into the question further, but I am quite sure that England and all the other countries that have made changes were compelled to do so on account of conditions in the world, and the trade leaving the country. They had to do something to maintain it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one observation in connection with the exhibit submitted by the able Senator from Massachusetts? Apparently the Peruvian protest related principally to the proposed duty upon copper.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is correct, but in part also the duty upon oil.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I want to suggest to the Senator that inasmuch as Peru has had a duty upon copper for years and years, Peru is not in good position to complain if finally, for the first time since 1894, we find it necessary to protect our copper. I submit that Peru, in logic, can not seriously defend a complaint against such action on our part.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course there are a good many of us here who do not think the situation in this country justifies a duty upon copper at this time.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, in common with my colleagues, I am greatly concerned and have the deepest interest in and sympathy for every industry in the United States that is suffering from overproduction, as to our own capacity to consume here at home, or from any of the other unfortunate and disastrous effects of the depression. I especially sympathize with every wage earner in America, who, under the effect of this abnormal and unusual condition, is either out of employment or in distress, or in employment on partial time and in more or less distress. I do believe, however, that those widespread conditions of privation and of distress should not cause us carelessly to rush to some supposedly sound remedy here which in fact, upon careful examination, would prove to be wholly unsound and ineffective.

Our friends who are proposing some of these requests for special governmental assistance seem to think that it is all right to enact embargo tariffs and depend upon the domestic producer to maintain reasonable price levels.

I was about to say a while ago, when interrupted, that all industries are suffering alike from the panic, they are suffering from unemployment, they are suffering from price dislocation, they are suffering from lack of markets, and also all industries, whether they are tariff protected or not, are suffering to a more or less extent in other ways. The overproducing industries are unable to get rid of their surpluses. That is a condition for which I do not think tariffs are a remedy, with all due respect to my colleagues.

The present situation relating to the enactment of indiscriminate tariffs and to a reliance upon industry to hold down prices to a reasonable level are commented upon by President Taft, and I read this extract in view of the vast number of our present rates, which will reveal themselves in this way when normal times return, if they ever will return, and I am sure they will, and also in the light of some of the views of my colleagues, who would enact indiscriminate rates and depend upon domestic industry to maintain reasonable price levels.

President Taft, on February 10, 1911, in a speech said:

> I am a Republican, and the Republican Party has always advocated and pursued a policy of protection to American products and manufactures. For a long time the policy had little or no limitation. It was thought that tariffs on protected products could not be too high; that if all foreign products were excluded, competition would stimulate production and reduce its cost and its price. The temptation to destroy competition by combination became so great, however, that the party in its platform modified its policy and imposed the limitation that the tariff should be limited for purposes of protection to the difference between the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad.

That was the thoroughly demonstrated experience of Republican administrations many years ago. It is folly for us to undertake a repetition of it as normal times approach by depending upon wholly exorbitant tariff policies, with beneficiaries who profess themselves willing to hold down their prices.

In my judgment, the chief trouble with the number of our surplus-producing industries in this country to-day is the fact that they have carelessly and thoughtlessly developed a hopeless and uncontrolled condition of overproduction, a condition which can only be dealt with, perhaps, by concerted action in some legitimate way, and not through tariff enactments here at Washington, which would only stimulate still further production, and in the end and soon cause any artificial price increase to topple to the ground.

Mr. President, we get back in the end to the simple issue of whether there shall be a fundamental difference between the two political parties on economics in this country as conditions present themselves to-day. That condition relates to whether the present forces of half insane economic isolation shall be attacked and checked in the policy of ever-increasing obstruction to international trade and commerce, a policy of tariff revision back first to a level of moderation, with liberalized trade policies, in lieu of the present trouble-breeding methods and policies in international trade and commerce. In the second place, it involves the issue of whether this great Nation will in the future practically rely alone on the home market, which is impregnable in almost every essential respect, and proceed in the future to restrict production, production of our cotton, our wheat, our automobiles, our textiles, our iron and steel, our pottery, our glassware, and our agricultural products of all kinds, whether we will restrict production down to our capacity to consume, barring some casual interchanges of cotton for coffee or some other commodity, and other sporadic items in international commerce.

We will pursue that policy under the blind leadership of that small but powerful group who have been leading the Nation during the past 10 or 12 years or we will pursue the opposite course of becoming a leader of the American people and other important countries in support of the policy that the future business progress and welfare of this country demand both a domestic market and an adequate foreign-market outlet for our surplus production in all important lines.

That policy would bring back home the 2,000 plants which have been constructed abroad by American capital which has been forced to take its flight in order to produce and sell. That policy would put back into employment eight or ten million wage earners who are idle to-day. That policy would rehabilitate our prostrate agriculture. That policy would lead the nations of the world back to that higher level of economic standards and practices and policies which would afford the maximum of happiness and prosperity to the business man, to the farmer, and to the wage earner.

During the delivery of Mr. HULL's speech,

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the committee amendment appearing on page 241, in lines 9 to 11. It requires a small perfecting amendment which ought to be put in to carry out the intention of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. To what does the amendment relate?

Mr. REED. It relates to a proviso of the lubricating-oil tax. We put in the words "but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall not apply with respect to the importation of such articles." We all thought the provisions of the general tariff laws relieved articles that were exported from the effect of these taxes, but I find upon investigation that that is not so, and the amendment I would propose, if reconsideration is agreed to, would be to change that italicized provision to read:

> But the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall not apply to articles sold for exportation or exported for sale, nor with respect to the importation of such articles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

After the conclusion of Mr. HULL's speech,

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVALS

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On May 17, 1932:

S. 3584. An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico."

On May 19, 1932:

S. 4289. An act to amend the act of February 23, 1927, as amended (U. S. C., title 47, sec. 85), and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library to procure an oil portrait of former President Calvin Coolidge.

AMENDMENT OF NATURALIZATION LAWS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is a conference report on the Secretary's desk. It will lead to no discussion. I ask that it be laid before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate from the table a conference report submitted yesterday, which will be read.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

H. D. HATFIELD,
HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
WILLIAM H. KING,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL DICKSTEIN,
JNO. W. MOORE,
ALBERT JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the bill reached the House there was objection made upon the ground that it was supposed it would incur some little expense in the Labor Department in procuring certain information with respect to immigrants. Upon examination when the conferees met, it was discovered that there would be no increase whatever needed in the appropriation and the House receded. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate very long. We find some Senators who are very much concerned about our world trade. We do not hear them discussing very much the question of our home trade. When statistics prove to us that our home trade is nine times more important than the world trade, then I am convinced that we should indeed give serious consideration to our home trade, just nine times more than we should give to the trade which we receive in the way of exchange of goods in the world trade.

We hear others discussing the situation, if it could be brought about, where prices would be evened up and where the same standard of wage paid to the wage earner in Europe would apply to the wage earner of America, then and not until then will we be able in America, in my judgment, to do away with the principles of a protective tariff and still give consideration to the workmen in America and the wage that he demands, the wage that he should receive which will enable him to clothe and educate his children.

Mr. President, there seems to be considerable difference of opinion as to the amount of revenue the four items listed under title 4 of the manufacturers' excise taxes, section 601, subsections 4, 5, 6, and 7, inclusive, which tax is levied against import products, and due to the uncertainty as claimed by some Senators as to what this revenue will pay in dollars and cents when applied to imports a number of Senators are opposed to this levy altogether and by so doing they extend a protective support to those who are interested in these imports against our home industry.

Granting that these levies would not produce a great deal of revenue, there are other elements of a protective nature due these American industries that are worthy of consideration outside and above all returns to the Treasury of the United States that this levy may produce in the way of finance.

First. It would save a great independent industry, provided the tax is raised to 1 cent a gallon, that is free from monopoly, that at the present time furnishes between 50 and 60 per cent of the oil consumed in America to-day.

Second. It would save the investment which a great number of patriotic Americans have made in this industry.

Third. It would insure the additional employment of a great number of American workmen, due to the demand of additional production of American oil, its ramifications, and demand for other materials, and last but not least, it will reflect its influence in stabilizing the coal industry of this country which I will undertake to show.

It would stabilize the price of American gasoline at the present time and in the years to come and prevent the American consumer from paying an outrageous price for the basic and secondary product after monopoly has taken place in the country of this liquid fuel.

Permit me to read a statement made by Mr. Casey Adams before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining as to what is happening in this country to-day in the way of competition in the gasoline market by cut-throat practice that is engaged in by those who are selling imported gasoline in the city that represents the hub of the automobile industry of the world, Detroit, Mich.

* * * And many of these self-same leaders are also interested in domestic and foreign oil. What care the Mellons and the Rockefellers about the success of bituminous coal when they can sell their foreign oil through the Standard of New Jersey, Standard of Indiana, the Gulf Refining Co.—the three chief importers in this country.

In 1929, out of about 111,000,000 barrels imported, the Mellon-Rockefeller imports were as follows:

Standard Indiana	35,098,835
Standard New Jersey	22,879,466
Gulf Refining	21,426,338
Total	79,404,339

Even the Dutch Shell Co. only imported 11,000,000 barrels.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is an advertisement reproduced in the Petroleum News of a page advertisement appearing in the Detroit News, which shows Rumanian imported gasoline eight gallons for a dollar.

I ask permission to have the advertisement referred to inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The advertisement is as follows:

[The Independent Petroleum Association of America Monthly. "Imported Zip"—Tariff Commission Report—When a Great Industry Stands Still—$101,000,000 Trade Balance—Imports, and Our Oversupply—Why "Another" Oklahoma?—$360,000,000 Shrinkage in Two Years—No "Dykes" Along Our Coast—Threat and Realization. November-December, 1931. 10 cents]

THIS IS NOT OUR AD

It is, however, a reproduction of an ad in the Detroit Evening Times of December 9, 1931.

Two tankers of gasoline from Constanza, Rumania, recently found their way to Detroit, Mich.—and apparently Imported Zip was made in Rumanian refineries in southeastern Europe, sent through the Black Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, across the Atlantic Ocean, and either up the St. Lawrence River, through Lake Ontario and Lake Erie to Detroit—or landed at Baltimore, Md., and sent by tank car to Detroit. From Constanza to Detroit is about 7,000 miles.

The ad says, "8 gallons for $1," and 25,000 gallons "given away." How's that for high-pressure competition with American gasoline?

(12) [Detroit Evening Times, Wednesday, December 9, 1931]

Thursday and Friday we will give away 25,000 gallons of Imported Zip, a premium motor fuel.

Your opportunity to prove—at our expense—that Imported Zip will give you better engine performance.

Now is the time for you to prove that Imported Zip gives better engine performance—better performance and saving up to 5 cents per gallon over what you are paying for other premium gasolines.

You, the public, are the sole judge. Sunny Service Oil Co. furnishes gasoline free of charge to make your own test of the superb qualities of Imported Zip.

Test it in your own way. Test it for fast pick-up. Test it for acceleration. Test it for easy starting. Test it on hills, in the country; anyway you like; but test it and be certain.

Thursday and Friday drive into any Zip station (a list of which is shown here), buy 8 gallons of Imported Zip for $1, and we will give you, in addition, with our compliments, 1 gallon free.

Drive your car on Imported Zip 15 or 20 miles. If you are not completely satisfied that it performs better than any other premium gasoline selling up to 5 cents per gallon more, drive back to the station, have the 8 gallons drained from your tank, and get your money back. The 1 gallon of Imported Zip has not cost you one penny. Could anything be fairer?

Here is your opportunity to prove, at our expense, that Imported Zip will give you better performance. Don't take our word for it. Try it and find out for yourself.

Imported Zip gasoline is high grade in every respect, yet it sells at a price anyone can afford to pay. The proof of what we say is in your hands. You are the judge and jury. Give us your verdict Thursday and Friday.

Eight gallons, $1. Save up to 5 cents per gallon. Read the amazing guaranty we make on Imported Zip.

MONEY BACK GUARANTY

Drive into any Sunny Service station, buy 8 gallons of Imported Zip—we give you another gallon free.

Drive 15 or 20 miles, and if you are not satisfied that Imported Zip gives you better engine performance than any other premium motor fuel selling up to 5 cents more per gallon, drive back to the station; we will drain the unused gasoline and refund your money.

And yet, some say, "You don't need a tariff."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, during the embargo of the World War, in what condition did the American people find themselves with reference to chemicals? They found that they were shorn of chemicals which were essential to the welfare of the sick because of the Great War that was being waged in Europe. But to-day what is the condition of the chemical industry of America? We have a self-sufficient industry in this respect, one that can serve the people with the raw materials not only in an industrial way but in a medicinal way, and at the same time sell to the nations of the world. This is due primarily to the embargo that took place during the World War; secondly, to the Fordney-McCumber law enacted in 1922, and a continuation of the protection of this industry in part through the Smoot-Hawley tariff law enacted in 1930. Were it not for the fact of the invoking of these protective laws, America would be shorn of her chemical industry to-day.

I wish to make the prediction that when the time comes in America, due to the cartel which has been developed between Germany, England, France, and other countries, this industry which is so colossal in its development will fall before that competitive group of European chemical competitors when the tariff rates are lowered.

The same principle will apply to the gasoline and to the crude-oil business of America. Just as soon as the independent oil man is forced to sell to the combine upon the auction block his investment and the investment of his friends, made in good faith to develop a basic and independent industry in this country, then will the American people experience a higher price which they will be forced to pay for their gasoline and fuel oil which they are not paying at the present time.

For that reason I stand for the protection of the independent oil producers of America. I stand for the protection of those men and women who represent these industries as stockholders. If the Congress will but adopt this rate of 1 cent per gallon on crude oil, in my candid judgment the independent oil industry will continue to exist and at the same time the price paid by the consumer will not be enhanced to any very great extent, certainly not on the by-products, such as gasoline. But if we permit this opportunity to pass, as we permitted it to pass in the Congress of 1930, when we had the opportunity to put a tariff upon oil to protect the independent oil producers of the country, then, in my candid judgment, the fate of these men will be sealed and the combine, the big four, will absorb them and the American people will lose their opportunity to buy liquid fuel at a competitive price.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HATFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will remember that at hearings before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining, the head of the Federated Industries of the State of Washington was asked a question as to the number of men unemployed in that State. In his reply he said that if the industries of the State of Washington were accorded the proper protection against imports which were coming into that State from foreign countries, it would mean the employment of 25,000 workers. Allowing four to a family, the effect would be that 100,000 people would be put in a position where they would be dependent upon their own earning capacity rather than upon someone else or upon charity.

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes, Mr. President; the representative referred to from the State of Washington made the statement that a protective tariff upon lumber would assure the employment of at least 25,000 lumbermen in that State, and he made the further forecast that the number of 25,000 could be multiplied by five to represent the number to be found in the average family, according to the recent statistics of the Government of the United States. Accordingly, 125,000 people would be taken care of and the head of the family, the breadwinner, would be able to procure work which would enable him to feed and to clothe and to educate his children. That was practically his statement in response to an interrogation made by the distinguished junior Senator from the State of Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. President, I desire to continue to quote the statement of Mr. Adams, to show what he thought 1 cent a gallon on crude oil, with a compensatory duty on its by-products, would do in the way of helping the coal miners of this country. I may say in behalf of Mr. Adams that I have never listened to a more intelligent, frank, and open witness in dealing with economic problems that affect this country. He said:

Mr. ADAMS. I read it at the time that the mills were going to charge Los Angeles for power at the plant and I thought then that on the cut-throat competition that existed in coal and fuel oil they could certainly manufacture it cheaper than they could buy it and take the loss in transmission.

Continuing to quote from Mr. Adams:

A tariff on oil is, of course, necessary. The tariff should be at the minimum 1 cent the gallon and I hope the members of this committee will use their best efforts to have restored the 1-cent excise tax which has been reduced to one-half cent. Such a tax will, in time, give employment to 40,000 men in the bituminous and anthracite industry.

At this point, Mr. President, I should like to read from the statement by Harvey C. Fremming, representing the Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refining Workers of America in regard to unemployment which exists in the oil fields at the present time. This statement is taken from the hearings held on the revenue revision last February before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. I quote from the testimony of Harvey C. Fremming, of Long Branch, Calif., as follows:

Mr. FREMMING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Harvey C. Fremming, and I am international president of the Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refining Workers of America, an organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. For the purpose of expediting the hearing and in our desire not to burden the patience of the committee, this statement that I am about to make is concurred in and adopted by the following, officially representing the organizations named:

Edward J. McGrady, legislative representative, American Federation of Labor.

M. J. Flynn, America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference.

D. C. Cone, Brotherhood of Signalmen.

A. S. Stout, Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way.

A. J. Lovell, Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen.

George Laughlin, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

W. D. Johnson, Order of Railroad Conductors.

J. A. Farquharson, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

I am sure it is unnecessary for me to state that this group represents directly affiliated members in a number exceeding five and one-half million, practically all of whom are citizens and voters.

Mr. Chairman, if I might have the privilege of picking out some of the immediate high lights of the statement that I am going to make and then be privileged to file the statement as my statement——

Mr. DOUGHTON (presiding). That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. RAGON. That is the Big Four Brotherhood?

Mr. FREMMING. The entire group, Mr. Congressman, of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. RAGON. Whom do you represent?

Mr. FREMMING. The Oil Workers' International Union. I am their president.

I am going to deal with the four points made by the spokesman for the oil-importing business at the hearing on the excise bill. While these are palpably misstatements of fact, it might not be amiss to constructively set forth the actual facts which are at total variance with the fabulous statements presented by this apologist for the present disastrous situation. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, you will recall, with me, that this gentleman said the unemployment in the oil industry amounted to approximately 35,000 people. I think you will recall, with me, that statement. May I be permitted to introduce, in this statement, the record of the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, which shows that the decrease from the 1926 basis of 100 has fallen down to approximately 50 per cent, or 54.9 per cent of the total employment in the oil fields at that time of 800,000. I want to get that clearly in your mind. Obviously, then, if we carry down that index, we find that the amount of unemployment in the oil industry, on the basis of the information compiled through competent sources, is approximately 350,000 instead of 35,000, as stated by the gentleman. I am filing the complete index, so that you can, if you desire, review those figures, where they are carried down from 1929 by months, showing the reduction both in pay rolls as well as in employment.

I understand that these indexes are taken from the firms in the various States, who report to the bureau monthly. Those firms in the State of California, my State, are 43 in number; yet we have several hundred oil businesses; and remember, further, with me, Mr. Chairman, that these indexes do not include the insolvent concerns, the firms that have gone into bankruptcy during the last two years; nor do they include the allied industries which are so interlocked, so definitely interlocked with the conduct of the petroleum business. By that I mean the oil-tool manufacturers, and all of the allied groups. Nor does that index include the railroads or the transportation companies. In our State a tremendous amount of oil is transported in oil-tank cars, and that has been reduced to practically nothing. Nor does it include at all the serious condition of unemployment that reflects itself in the communities in our oil-producing area, where bankruptcies and insolvencies and bank failures have reduced the economic well-being of those areas to almost nothing.

Mr. President, there is a picture which is portrayed dealing with the oil situation in the great State of California. That picture can not be obliterated or effaced. When the representatives of the American Federation of Labor, speaking for 5,000,000 employees, come in numerous groups before a congressional committee having under consideration these items, and especially the oil item, and ask for consideration upon the part of Congress, I feel that the Congress should respond to the appeal of these patriotic Americans. There should be no hesitation upon the part of the Senate of the United States as to what it should do, regardless of whether those who make up this body believe that it is inappropriate to consider tariff measures or tariff rates in conjunction with a revenue bill.

Mr. President, we have excellent authority and an excellent precedent for the attitude that some of us take in the consideration of the tariff items in this revenue bill. Back in the days of President Washington in 1791 the first revenue bill had attached to it a tariff bill, and it was following the successful operation of that tariff law that the Father of our Country in his message to the Congress of the United States spoke of the "happiness and the contentment" that existed among the citizenship of this country. I can see no reason, Mr. President, why upon any revenue bill we should not attach a tariff rate or direct the Tariff Commission to protect a languishing industry under the Stars and Stripes.

When one goes to any European nation he will find there that authority is given to some group to invoke, almost overnight, a tariff rate, even to the embargo point if necessary, in order to protect an industry under the flag of that nation.

Back in the heyday of the chemical industry in this country, when there was no tariff upon chemicals there was an outstanding American whose posterity still represents the chemical industry of America in the great State of New Jersey. At that time he exclusively enjoyed the American ultramarine-blue trade of America. After the great German cartel had been developed along the River Rhine to the point where they not only could serve their own people but the peoples of other nations of Europe, they started out in quest of new business and they found the United States of America, Mr. President, a very fertile field indeed. They came here and they displaced the American chemist. He was producing ultramarine blue to the entire satisfaction of the American consumers; but when the German chemist was willing to sell his wares in America at a stipend very much less than that for which the ultramarine-blue producer of America could sell his, what was the result?

This sturdy American happened to be of German extraction. He did not easily give up. He was willing with his stockholders to battle against the German chemical industry which had made this invasion into his trade. He loaded up a full shipload of ultramarine-blue products and started across the Atlantic to a German port. Before he could land his goods there an embargo rate went into effect, and the American chemist was compelled to retrace his path across the Atlantic and, finally, with his industry and his stockholders, to stare bankruptcy in the face.

That industry languished before the embargo period of the World War. To-day it is a progressive industry. During the embargo period and under the protection of the Fordney-McCumber tariff rates this industry has paid a return to its stockholders and is flourishing to-day.

The same condition prevails so far as the independent oil producers of America are concerned. They are suffering from an acute depression owing to unfair foreign competition.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Is it not also a fact that they actually kept that dye industry out of this country until the necessity of war made them yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. Absolutely so. I am glad the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has asked me the question. Our chemical industry languished from that day down to the embargo period; and during the World War period, due to the lack of certain chemical products which could not be produced in America, the price of those chemical products, due to the fact that they were of German make, rose from $3 an ampule to $50 an ampule. Even then these products could not be furnished to the satisfaction and to the demands of the American physician. The same condition confronted the American surgeon as to novocaine and cocaine and the other local anæsthetics.

In the Army of the United States it was indeed difficult to procure a sufficient amount of these drugs to perform minor operations properly from a surgical point of view, because they were not produced in America, as the American citizen had depended upon obtaining a supply of these indispensable chemicals from the German cartel along the River Rhine.

That was the condition, Mr. President. I say to you that the history of the chemical industry of this country is to me complete proof that if we are to be prosperous in the future it is absolutely essential that we shall continue the principle of protective tariff. We can abandon that principle only when Europeans are willing to raise their standard of living and to raise their standard of wages to a point which will make the cost of producing European commodities the same as the cost of producing like commodities in America.

When that period comes I will anticipate that the millennium will not be far ahead. I feel that we must go along in the future, as we have in the past, protecting our industries primarily that they may pay to the American wage earner a standard of wage of which he is worthy.

Mr. President, I have another communication which I wish to read to my colleagues and have printed in the RECORD. This letter is addressed to me. It is dated Indianapolis, Ind., May, 1932, and is as follows:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1932.

Hon. HENRY D. HATFIELD,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Under date of June 8, 1929, speaking for the membership of the United Mine Workers of America, I addressed you a communication urging the vital necessity of Congress levying a tariff on foreign-produced petroleum oil imported to the United States.

In this letter an analysis was made of the effect of the unrestricted competition of this imported oil in the coal markets of the United States and the demoralizing effect upon the mining communities of our country, both from the standpoint of labor and the capital investment. The conditions referred to as existing in 1929 exist to-day in more aggravated form. In my judgment, a duty on foreign oil is an imperative necessity. The duty should be at the minimum of 1 cent per gallon. Such a tax will, in time, give employment to 40,000 men in the bituminous and anthracite industries. In the fields of transportation, distribution, and consumption of the increased coal product, it will give direct employment to many thousands more and be a practical contribution to national well-being.

I most earnestly hope for favorable action on this question by the Senate.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. LEWIS, President.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter addressed to me on June 8, 1929, a copy of which I have here, be published in the RECORD in connection with this letter which I have just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Indianapolis, Ind., June 8, 1929.

Hon. HENRY D. HATFIELD,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As president of the United Mine Workers of America and speaking for that organization, I earnestly urge upon the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress the vital necessity of a tariff on the import of foreign-produced petroleum oil imported into the United States. And I request that in the preparation of a tariff law, a task with which Congress is now engaged, you provide for such tariff on oil. This action will be in the best interests of the general public of the United States, because it will aid very greatly in affording employment for many thousands of now idle men in the coal-producing industry, thus enabling these men to earn a living for themselves and their families.

The free importation of cheap oil from foreign countries into the United States has had a depressing effect upon American-produced coal, and we see no good reason why this great, vital, fundamental American industry should be thus penalized in favor of foreign industry and foreign labor. There is no question but that consumption of many millions of tons of coal has been displaced by the use of oil produced in the United States. This of itself has done vast injury to the coal industry. To permit the continued free entry of many more millions of barrels of foreign oil simply means still further shrinkage in the consumption of American coal and the wrecking of this great American industry. Just how this thing works will be made clear when I point out that the 431,067,000 barrels of fuel oil used in the United States in 1927 displaced 110,000,000 tons of coal, or approximately 20 per cent of the normal output of American coal mines. Even this displacement was so disastrous as to close a vast number of mines and to throw many thousands of mine workers out of employment. And now, if this Government permits the continued free entry of foreign-produced oil, it will mean the closing down of more mines and the unemployment of more thousands of men.

When hundreds of thousands—aye, millions—of men are out of work, as is the case at present, there must necessarily follow a slump in business and commence of the country. These men, with no opportunity to earn a living, have no money to spend. They can not buy the products of mills, factories, and shops. They can not trade with local merchants and business men. Consequently the entire business and industrial structure of our country suffers from business depression. Especially is this true in those countless communities—once prosperous, but now practically bankrupt—where coal mines either are wholly idle or operating but a few hours a week and where the earnings of coal-mine workers have shrunk almost entirely, if not altogether, to the vanishing point. Coal is produced in 30 States, and these conditions exist in each and every one of these 30 States. We contend that Congress should not take any step that would further aggravate this intolerable condition, and this is what would happen if foreign oil were given continued entry free of tariff duty into the United States.

We contend further, that it is the duty of Congress to protect the interests of American labor rather than that of foreign labor. Americans are not employed to any appreciable extent in the production of oil in foreign countries. Wages paid for labor performed in the production of oil in those foreign countries goes to inhabitants of those countries. They receive American money for producing oil that would be shipped duty free into the United States and throw thousands more American workingmen out of employment. There would be no justice in such a plan from the standpoint of the best interests of the American public. On the other hand, an adequate tariff on foreign oil, whether it comes from Mexico, South America, or anywhere else, would strengthen the demand for American oil and American coal for fuel purposes in this country, and it would mean employment, earning power, food, clothing, shelter, education, and progress for countless thousands of good, loyal American citizens. It would mean a revival of the coal industry, now so near to the industrial graveyard. It would mean improvement in industry, trade, commerce, and transportation. It would mean more business for the merchants and business men of the 30 coal-producing States. I may state it clearly as our position that these considerations far outweigh any benefit that could possibly accrue to the people of the United States by permitting foreign oil to enter this country duty free.

Our understanding of the matter is that tariff duties are levied for two purposes, viz, to raise revenue for the Government and to protect American industry and American labor from the destructive competition of pauper wages paid to labor in many foreign countries. I do not hesitate to say that Congress can find no other American industry that needs this kind of protection to-day more than does the fuel industry.

Therefore, in the name of the United Mine Workers of America and in behalf of American labor, I again earnestly urge that Congress levy an adequate tariff duty on the import of foreign oil into the United States.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. LEWIS, President.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the same blackjacking tactics of certain oil companies which were aimed at a distinguished Member of this body from New England were directed at me long before the question of tariff rates upon crude oil was under consideration by this body. I have introduced some of these telegrams; among other messages, an anonymous letter setting out the purpose that the writer wished to accomplish, to intimidate the Congressmen representing the congressional districts of the State of West Virginia, and for the further purpose of intimidating the Senators who represent the State of West Virginia in this body in opposing oil tariff on American crude oil and its by-products. In no uncertain language I exposed this conspiracy from my desk here in the Senate. The same attack has been made upon a distinguished Member of this body from the great State of Connecticut.

I wish to say in behalf of Senator BINGHAM that his record here is typical of a great American who has uppermost in his mind, in his vote, and in his influence the support of industries, and also the support of labor, with the thought, no doubt, that he stands for a wage that is worthy of the toiler.

This item in subsection 4 of the revenue bill now before the Senate for consideration is not to be compared from a revenue point of view; but what it will accomplish toward the replacement of those who are looking for work at the present hour is the principal consideration.

We have other tax items in this bill, under the subheads heretofore referred to, which some Senators refuse to vote because of the fact that such a tax smacks of the elements of protection, as is the case with oil, which tax, if voted on these items, would regain, at least in part, employment for those who are now unemployed. A tax rate of 1 cent per gallon on crude oil would guarantee the employment, I am reliably informed, of at least 300,000 workers. Multiply that by 5, representing the average family, and what do you have? One million five hundred thousand people happy again because the breadwinner is employed.

In the lumber industry alone in the State of Washington, according to Mr. Botting's statement before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining, as pointed out by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] in his interrogations of Mr. Adams, 25,000 men would be employed if they had the proper protection.

Multiply that by 5, Mr. President, and you will have 125,000. Add these items together, and then go to the copper industry; and when they tell us that conservatively at least 150,000 people will be employed if a tax is placed upon copper, multiply that by 5 and what do you have? Why, in these items you have the assurance of a favorable service by the Congress of the United States to at least two and a half million people.

Mr. President, if my vote will accomplish this for American industries that are now languishing, for American labor that is looking for work when there is none to be found, I wish to say that regardless of its popularity, whether it be popular back home or not, I shall vote for it.

West Virginia at one time boasted of a hardwood forest that was surpassed by the forests of no State in the Union, based upon its square mileage. That great forest was devastated, and to-day West Virginia is importing lumber from other lumber States. The same thing is true of copper. West Virginia, with all of her great natural resources in coal, in shale, in oil, in glass sands, and other great natural resources, is destitute of copper; but I can only hope, through and by my recognition of the rights and privileges of others who ask for protection of their industry, to receive a like consideration from others.

You may call this logrolling in tariff making, or whatever you please, Mr. President, but, so far as I am concerned, reciprocity is a good term. Regardless of what economists may say, regardless of what a professor in some university may advocate, regardless of what the eugenics teacher or the parlor economist may advise, I want to say to you that in my candid judgment there never was a tariff bill written in this Congress or any other Congress that represented a great constellation of States such as the United States of America unless reciprocity was extended by the Representatives in the House and by the Senators who were willing to protect each other's industries within the confines of their States.

Mr. President, I have one proud record, and it is the one record of which I am proud, to which I shall point with pride when I leave this body—that I never failed to vote for a tariff rate for any State where it was shown to me that the industry involved and the people employed in that industry should have the protection asked for. Far be it from me ever to change my record and fail to do my plain duty as I see it and understand it as a representative in the Senate of the United States of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the amendment under discussion is both a revenue and a relief measure, proposed at a time when the revenues of our Government must be increased, and when the production of petroleum, one of our most important basic industries, is in great distress.

According to the United States Census of Manufactures, the wholesale value of petroleum refining products in the United States in 1927 was $2,142,648,000. But four other groups of manufactured products in this country exceeded the petroleum group in such values. The first 10 groups, according to wholesale values, were as follows:

First. Meat-packing products.
Second. Motor vehicles.
Third. Iron and steel.
Fourth. Foundry machinery.
Fifth. Petroleum refining products.
Sixth. Electrical machinery.
Seventh. Printing and publishing.
Eighth. Cotton goods.
Ninth. Clothing and dress goods.
Tenth. Bread and bakery products.

All of these groups provide customs revenues to-day except the petroleum group.

Crude petroleum also is on the free list. Customs duties have been treated as a source of revenue since the beginning of the Government by every political party in control at the time of the enactment of a tariff law. No policy of the Democratic Party is more firmly established than that of deriving revenue from customs duties.

The last Democratic tariff act followed that policy as to perhaps 4,000 articles. Why petroleum should be excepted from that policy is beyond my understanding. It has been shown in this debate that fluctuations in the price of crude oil are not reflected in the price of gasoline, and that a duty of 42 cents a barrel on crude oil will be paid out of the cost of production differential, the figure representing the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. This means that the increased price will be absorbed by the great organizations dominating the petroleum situation in this country and owning or controlling most of the foreign supply.

With the production of crude oil rapidly increasing in foreign countries and the proposed duty considerably less than one-half of the difference in cost of production, it is reasonable to assume that our imports of 100,000,000 barrels will be maintained, if not increased, and that our revenues from an oil tax at this time will run anywhere from $30,000,000 to $42,000,000. Even if there should be a substantial decrease in imports, the revenue would still be substantial and exceedingly worth while.

During the past 12 years the average production of petroleum in the United States has exceeded the demand, domestic and foreign, by 59,000,000 barrels, while the average yearly increase in storage has amounted to 35,000,000 barrels. We have been forced to curtail production, to adopt martial law in some of the States, to adopt all kinds of proration schemes, simply because 100,000,000 barrels have been imported annually without duty, importations which have been used to put down the price of crude oil by the dominant refiners without corresponding benefit to the consumer.

On this question of importation let me direct attention to the fact that four great companies—the Standard of Indiana, the Standard of New Jersey, the Gulf Oil Corporation, and the Dutch Shell—imported 77 per cent of all the crude oil brought into this country in 1931.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I wish to remind the Senator that one of the most ably edited Democratic papers in California has urged at least a dollar a barrel on crude petroleum as a protective measure; but the point is that that great paper indorsed the fact the Senator from Texas has just stated, namely, that the tax of 1 cent a gallon on crude oil has no feature of protection in it whatever but would be productive of revenue, which the Government sadly needs, fully indorsing the view expressed by the thoughtful Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator for his statement. The four great companies to which I have referred brought in 81 per cent of the importations of gasoline in 1931, and 96 per cent of the importations of all other refining products.

Let me call attention to this further fact in connection with importations. Venezuela has for some time been the largest producer of petroleum among the foreign countries. In 1931, however, Russia assumed first place. Her production in 1931 totaled 162,000,000 barrels, while Venezuela's output in the same year was only 115,000,000 barrels. Think of it; Russian production is now practically one-sixth of the total production in the United States, a sufficient amount to constitute a menace to producer prices and to standards of living in the United States.

For my part, I will never vote to subject my people to the competition of communistic, slave-ridden, Bolshevistic, God-repudiating Russia.

No other country in the world, outside our own, now approximates what Russia produces. The coming contest for control of world markets in petroleum will find Russia possessing a unique advantage in her practically inexhaustible supplies of petroleum, coupled with the fact that her labor costs are negligible. Russian labor is virtually slave labor. It is impossible for production costs in the United States ever to be reduced to the Russian level.

The imposition of an adequate tariff on petroleum and its refined products would impose no additional burden upon the consumer of gasoline. Comparison of prices paid for gasoline and prices paid for crude oil demonstrates the remarkable fact that there is no causal relation between the two. Gasoline frequently sells at its highest price when the crude oil from which it has been refined was purchased at the lowest price. The price of gasoline is determined by the great distributing corporations which manipulate it at will. Any comparison of prices paid at any period for crude oil and for gasoline will evidence what I have said. The gasoline price is arbitrarily fixed by those who are in control of the great marketing and distributing systems, the pipeline systems, through which this product reaches the ultimate consumer.

The Federal Trade Commission, discussing this question, on page 19 of the letter transmitting its report to Congress, said:

> With respect to refined products, at least in local sale and distribution, the price conditions reflect even less closely the actual changes in supply and demand, so far as they can be measured by concrete statistical facts. In part this corresponds to the normal conditions of local marketing over wide areas, but in part also to the fact that the varying prices at which the different Standard companies offer their products at the same time in their respective marketing territories are generally followed by their competitors.

In this letter the commission states that generally there is very little real competition among the few large purchasing companies.

Such are the comments of the Federal Trade Commission on this subject.

During 1931 the price of domestic oil in the largest producing sections was as low as 10 cents per barrel, and in many instances sold below the market in large quantities. That fact was not reflected in the selling price of gasoline or other petroleum products.

The continuance of low prices for gasoline, and the possibility of even lower prices being attained, depends upon the success of the movement, of which this amendment for a tax on crude petroleum and petroleum products is a vital part, to break the petroleum monopoly which has been almost completely attained by a few great oil importing corporations in the United States.

If the smaller companies in the United States are destroyed, as they will be destroyed unless some safeguard of this kind is erected, the American people will have to pay far higher prices than those cited by the Senator from Maryland this morning. When that monopoly is once in complete control, the American people will pay what people are paying in the other countries of the world where these monopolies are without competition, and that means a price ranging from 30 to 50 cents a gallon and even more for gasoline.

These facts, I take it, are a complete answer to the figures given by the Senator from Maryland this morning, conceding them to be true. I have given my reasons for not conceding his figures accurately to represent the situation.

Production of native petroleum in the United States could amply care for all the requirements of this Nation. The petroleum industry has endeavored to keep production well within the bounds of the market. In its efforts to stabilize the industry it has voluntarily put in force proration agreements and has secured State regulation of production, "pinching in" thousands of wells while hundreds of additional wells have been entirely shut off. As rapidly, however, as the American industry has reduced production, foreign oil imports owned or controlled for the most part by the few big American companies, have increased in quantity, nullifying all attempts to equate demand and supply. As a result poverty and unemployment have characterized many of the great oil-producing areas in the mid-continent section of our country and in other oil-producing sections, and the conditions continue on such a scale as to send up a cry to the pitying heavens for relief.

The influx of foreign oil, which pays no duty and is not burdened with the overhead carried by American petroleum, has defeated every attempt and every sacrifice made by the smaller producers to stabilize the industry, forced prices to a point in many instances ruinously below the cost of production, utterly demoralized the producing end of the business, driven from employment and to despair a large proportion of the 2,000,000 people ordinarily engaged in production and refining, wiped out millions of dollars formerly paid farmers for lease rentals and royalties, and on which these farmers were dependent as their only source for funds with which to meet tax, interest, and other cash obligations, diminished the revenues of State governments whose budgets were based largely on oil production, crippled or destroyed the markets afforded by the consuming and purchasing power of the 22,000,000 people dependent on the oil industry for a livelihood, thus aiding to weaken the financial and industrial structure of the entire Nation.

Let me invite attention to another fact. According to the testimony submitted in the hearings of the Finance Committee, the total average taxes on oil in this country, taxes now levied upon oil by governmental authority, State and National, including gross production taxes, ad valorem taxes, corporation taxes, income taxes, and gasoline taxes, exceed 100 per cent of the average selling price. This proves the importance of the petroleum industry as a general revenue factor. Why should domestic producers be compelled to bear all the burdens? Why should not the foreign article also be compelled to share in the production of revenue? All foreign oil sold in this country and the profit accruing to its owners should be taxed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I invite the attention of my colleague to the fact that the gross production taxes on oil by the State of Texas in 1927 for that year were $5,656,000 and for September, 1931, were $3,346,145.50. In Oklahoma for the fiscal year June 1, 1927, the amount was $12,102,426.28, and for the fiscal year 1931 it was $6,566,006.96. These are taxes which the domestic producer has to pay and which the foreigner does not in any wise have to pay and which are a burden on our own producers for the benefit of the foreign producers.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very glad to have these figures from my colleague.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Texas know how much taxes the foreign producer pays to the foreign governments?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I know that in the country producing more petroleum than is produced in any other country in the world outside our own the producer does not pay any taxes.

Mr. GEORGE. No taxes at all?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No taxes at all.

Mr. GEORGE. How does he get by with it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because the Government owns him and owns everything else. The Government does not pay any taxes to itself.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a Government monopoly?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is. I am referring to Russia.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, Russia!

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; Russia—Soviet Russia!

Mr. GEORGE. I had not heard that mentioned.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator was not here when I called attention to the fact that Russia produces about one-sixth as much petroleum as is produced in the entire United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, when Russia gets into the picture, we are pretty nearly hopeless in this country. Ever since Russia came over and speculated in our wheat market and frightened the Farm Board as it did, all we have to do is to say "Russia" and everyone has stage fright.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My good friend from Georgia can not laugh the matter out of court in that way. It is too serious a proposition.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the question of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Texas had referred to the amount of taxes paid by the oil companies in this country. I asked if he knew how much taxes are paid by the foreign producers to their governments. The Senator from Texas said one did not pay any because it was a Government monopoly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And that one country, Russia, is now producing nearly 175,000,000 barrels annually.

Mr. GORE. I am not able to speak of the figures of the gross production, but the gasoline tax is 8 cents a gallon in Venezuela.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was not speaking of Venezuela. The information the Senator gives us, however, is most important.

Mr. GORE. I understood, but I thought that might indirectly answer the question of the Senator from Georgia. I desire to add that gasoline is retailed in Venezuela at 30 cents a gallon not including the tax, twice as high as in this country including the tax, which reinforces the suggestion of the Senator from Texas that monopoly benefits even in Venezuela.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am delighted to have this information from the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact, the net price of gasoline, excluding the tax in America to-day, is around 7 cents a gallon. The net price of gasoline in Venezuela exclusive of taxes is about 30 cents per gallon. In other words, it sells for about four times as much in Venezuela, excluding the tax, as it sells for in America exclusive of taxes, notwithstanding the oil is produced at $1.03 per barrel less than it is produced for here.

If the Senator from Texas will permit, I want to read a few lines from the La Follette report on this monopoly that had to be guarded against in this country. I refer to the elder Robert M. La Follette, who investigated this matter and who, in the course of his report, said:

SUGGESTED REMEDIES

It would be useless in the closing days of this session to present a bill—which there is no time to consider, much less to pass—attempting to regulate the oil industry in any comprehensive manner. And the suggestions here made of certain remedies does not imply that other and more drastic ones may not later be found necessary.

It must be obvious from the facts set forth in this report that the business can not go on as at present organized and conducted. It is essential to the life of the industry and vital to the public also that neither the public nor the small independent producers and refiners shall be left as at present to the mercy of a combination which advances or depresses prices as it pleases. Unless some means can be found to prevent the manipulation of prices by the large companies, and particularly the Standard group, it is as certain as any future event can be that gasoline prices in the near future will be so advanced as to put gasoline beyond the reach of the public generally as a motor fuel.

I have not had time to review the entire report, but I would like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in one part of the report it is pointed out that if the monopoly obtains here as it has in other countries it is probably going to mean that gasoline in America will cost 50 cents to a dollar a gallon. I think those exact figures probably are mentioned in this report.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his contribution. It is indeed significant.

Mr. GEORGE. May I inquire if there is an import tax on gasoline in Venezuela?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That I do not know.

Mr. LONG. No; there is not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a tariff on petroleum will cause a larger use of domestic petroleum products and will incidentally enlarge the business of our merchant marine. In the coastwise traffic only ships of American registry may be used in transporting American fuel oil from tidewater nearest the oil fields to the consuming centers.

In my view, so many considerations of important, vital, and compelling nature unite in behalf of this proposition as to make its support a matter of logic, of justice, and of duty.

Mr. President, I have here three tables, Table No. 1 showing the United States production of crude and refined oil from 1920 to 1932, both inclusive, Table No. 2 showing the status of the petroleum industry for 1931, and Table No. 3 showing the world production of crude oil, all of which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I wonder if we can not get a unanimous-consent agreement now for a time to vote.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, without speaking for anyone other than myself, if that is to be proposed I would suggest that the fair thing to do would be to get the absent Members of the Senate back into the Chamber to see if they want to enter into such an agreement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well; I will withhold the matter for the present.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, yesterday I presented data of the United States Department of Agriculture showing that in 1930 farmers lost an estimated total of $346,000,000 on their operations. In 1931 the price level was almost exactly one-half what it was in 1930, consequently the losses were much heavier.

In other recent statements, I have pointed out the enormous tax burden, the staggering load of indebtedness, the great number of foreclosures and forced sales of farms, and other distressing conditions under which agriculture has been and is now laboring.

We hear a great deal about the lack of prosperity in industry, and the first measure to be passed by this Congress and signed by the President made available $2,000,000,000, primarily for the relief of industry through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with only incidental and, of course, limited aid to agriculture through crop-production loans. Notwithstanding, Mr. President, and I call the attention of the Senate to the fact, industry has not suffered anywhere nearly as much as agriculture, nor does it need relief anything like as much as does agriculture.

According to a tabulation published in the March, 1932, issue of the Monthly Letter of the National City Bank, bakery corporations in 1931 made an average net profit of 11.3 per cent, food-product corporations made an average net profit of 6.9 per cent; tobacco corporations, 13.6 per cent; shoe corporations, 5.7 per cent; stockyards, 8.3 per cent; chain stores, 15.7 per cent. Yes, and the power industry's revenue in 1931 exceeded that of the boom year of 1929 by about 1½ per cent. So far as the chain stores were concerned, they made a larger profit in 1931 than in 1930, their profits averaging 15.7 per cent in 1931 compared to 14.8 per cent in 1930. All these corporations sell products produced on the farm, either in their raw state or in a manufactured form. The average net profit of the 900 industrial corporations in the year 1931 totaled $592,105,000, which on the basis of a net worth of $17,703,059,000 yielded an average net return of 3.3 per cent.

To cite a few specific examples of the enormous profits made by some of the middlemen between the farmer and the consumer: The American Tobacco Co. in 1931 had a total net profit of $46,189,741, which is said to be a record earning for the company. This net profit was shown after paying handsome salaries to their executives. It paid its president more than $1,000,000, of which $168,000 was salary and $850,000 was a cash bonus. The salary alone was more than double the salary of the President of the United States, but in addition he received a bonus of more than three-quarters of a million dollars.

The General Foods Corporation and subsidiary companies for the year ended December 31, 1931, had total net earnings of $18,153,719, according to its annual report. This is equivalent to $3.44 per share on 5,275,667 shares and almost equals the earnings in 1930 totaling $19,085,595. These earnings in 1931 were left after the company had set up a reserve of $1,000,000.

An analysis recently prepared by the Ontario Financial Corporation showed that in 1931, out of 250 leading American corporations 176 were still paying cash dividends, and the average yield of these 176 at market prices on October 5, 1931, was 11.3 per cent.

Think of it! One hundred seventy-six of our leading corporations earning an average net profit of 11.3 per cent after paying all expenses and handsome salaries, while the farmers of the country were not even able to obtain the cost of production.

These enormous earnings are in striking contrast with the distressing condition of the farmers, who have received prices far below the actual costs of production. In this connection I desire to call attention to the fact that while this large tobacco company was making a record net profit of more than $46,000,000 in 1931, after paying handsome salaries to their executives, the tobacco growers were receiving ruinous prices from these great corporations. I read at this point a paragraph from a recent report of the United States Department of Agriculture showing the average prices received for tobacco by the farmers. It shows what these great corporations paid the farmer for the 1930 and 1931 crops:

Auction-floor prices for the 1931–32 season for types wholly or partially marketed up to April 1, compared with prices for the 1930–31 season, in cents per pound, as follows: Flue cured, 8.5 and 12; Burley (Kentucky), 8.6 and 15; Virginia fire cured, 5 and 8.3; Clarksville-Hopkinsville fire cured, 3.1 and 6.9; one sucker (Kentucky), 3.1 and 7; Green River, 3.3 and 8.9; Virginia sun cured, 5.8 and 7.7.

Mr. President, I submit that companies making such lavish profits as these, after paying huge salaries to their executives, could have paid the farmers much higher prices for their product than they did pay and still earn reasonable returns. The farmer was told that he had produced too much, and that this was the reason why better prices could not be paid for his products, but these corporations do not apply similar logic in fixing their own prices to consumers. Instead of passing on the reduced prices to the consumers they actually increased prices.

Mr. President, these are but a few illustrations of the inequality of agriculture with other industries. They indicate the disadvantageous position which our farmers occupy in bargaining with great corporations and combinations that purchase their products, process them, and sell them to the consumers. They suggest also how the farmers' prices are pushed down to disastrously low levels while the consumers are charged prices far out of line with what the farmers receive.

Yet what has this Congress done to relieve this intolerable situation? Has it passed any measure or considered any measure to restore equality to agriculture, outside of measures for extending additional credit of one kind or another? Neither Agricultural Committee nor any other committee of this Congress has reported any constructive measure to cope with this situation. As a consequence to-day there is no such measure pending on the calendar of either House of this Congress.

Mr. President, the farmers of this country are beginning to believe that their elected representatives in Congress are either unwilling or are extremely dilatory in promoting their interests. They can not understand why a Congress, which is so willing to dispense billions of dollars of Federal money for the benefit of the railroads, the banks, and other great industries, and put aside all other legislation in order to speed through such relief measures for industry and commerce, can stay in session for five months and pass no remedy whatever for the relief of the basic industry of this country, when it is harder hit and in greater distress than any other important industry in this country.

Mr. President, I again assert agriculture must be rescued.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. NORBECK obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield for that purpose?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] has the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORBECK. For a moment; yes.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will pardon me, I will try not to prolong this. I wanted to see if we could get the agreement that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] asked about.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is going to present the matter a little later.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, we have heard of the distress of people in the oil industry, and I do not question the correctness of that statement. I know they have not entirely escaped the depression. There is unemployment even in the big oil fields.

We hear at other times of the distress of the men in the lumber industry. One of them writes me and says, "If I could only get a tariff of a dollar a thousand, my trouble would be over. Why do you stand in the way?" I wrote and asked him whom he expected to pay that dollar extra to him.

Mr. President, when will we learn that a rule of economics that must be observed before we can make any progress is that you can not give anybody a dollar without taking it away from somebody else? It is proposed to bestow a gift upon certain people who are in need of jobs, or of a living, or of dividends, or of profits. Whom are we going to take it away from? That is a question that is never answered on this floor.

Why should the Senate of the United States indulge in the pastime of trying to lift itself by its boot straps? Why should we continue to assume that we could bestow a financial advantage upon one group without charging the expense to some other group? To-day we are faced with the same arguments as before. When will we recognize the absurdity of it?

American producers protest against the importation of oil from foreign lands. A little of it is imported, but we export more. We are not on a domestic basis, and nothing has been said about the fact that we have two or three years' supply in storage tanks. Nothing has been said about the fact that the oil business is a good deal like the wheat business just now. We have a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and we have been pleading here for the last 8 or 10 years for some way to make the tariff effective.

I do not know whether this tariff on oil, if it should be enacted, would be effective; but it will be either effective or noneffective. If it is effective, then it will do just what is claimed for it; it will increase the price of the refined product. It will add a tax upon every home in the land. If it is noneffective, it will be used as an excuse for raising the price of gasoline and other oil products, and the tariff will be blamed for it, and this body will be charged with it, and these individual Senators will have to answer for it. We will have the increased price if we pass the bill whether the tariff is effective or noneffective.

My sympathy goes out to these men who work in the oil fields. I have been in this line of work myself. Two years ago I listened carefully to the proponents of this plan, and I came to the conclusion that the tariff would not be effective. It takes something more than a tariff to bring up the price of crude oil to a higher level. It takes additional legislation to make the tariff effective, and I do not think we can bring back prosperity until we have average earnings on the part of the average family.

When we are just going to put something more in one man's pocket at the expense of another man whose pocket is nearly empty, we just prolong the trouble and add to the difficulty.

There was complaint that oil came in from Venezuela, where it was produced much cheaper than here. I do not deny the statement; but the difference is not as great as we were told. We were told that we were competing with cheap labor down there, very cheap native labor; but when I asked what they were paying their drillers, they said, "$15 a day."

"Why?"

"They are American drillers."

"Are you paying them from the day they leave home?"

"Yes."

"Then, where does the cheapness come in?"

"Oh, it is partly in the extra labor they have around the rigs. That is very, very cheap; and it is partly in the casing that is used in the well, which is bought at a European price instead of an American price."

No emphasis is put on the fact that it is an inferior grade of oil, as a rule, that comes in.

The statement has been made here that oil is produced in the Central American countries at $1.03 a barrel less than in this country. I have been looking through the Tariff Commission report trying to find that statement somewhere, because I knew it was not correct. I think I have found the source of the statement, which is simply this: That a certain field in Central America has a production cost of $1.03 less than the average for the whole of the United States of America, which produces a different kind of oil. I suggest that we will have to go into the matter deeper to get comparative costs than to use those figures.

CONSERVE OUR NATURAL RESOURCES

We have a surplus of oil; and what should be done about it? We act as though there would be no end of it. We have a large amount now; but we forget that all of New England has no oil and never did have. We forget that the eastern fields, like those of Pennsylvania, that were famous 40 years ago for their oil production, are nearly dead now. We forget that wells that produced 1,000 barrels a day in Pennsylvania are not producing 4 gallons a day now. We forget that the famous fields of Ohio have practically gone dry, and that the wells of large production are now barely producing. They pump a few gallons out of them once a week. We forget that the same thing has taken place in Indiana, and that Indiana has gone down to almost no production. We forget that the same thing has taken place in Illinois, and that there is practically no oil production in Illinois. Those fields were famous 20 years ago. We forget that there has been a similar falling-off in West Virginia. We forget that the States of the Southeast have no substantial oil production. We forget that Iowa and Wisconsin and the Dakotas produce no oil. We forget that Nebraska has no oil and that very little of Kansas has oil. We forget that Wyoming, which even 10 years ago was rated as one of the great oil-producing States, has gone down to a distressing level, because it is approaching exhaustion. We forget that the oil production to-day in the United States comes from just a few spots Southwest. The wells are so strong that they are producing oil faster than we can use it. But why must it all be produced and used in this generation?

We have used up 75 per cent of our forests in one century. We have 25 per cent left for the centuries to come. Are we not going to be in even worse shape with oil in the near future? Is it not a good plan to leave some of our oil in the ground until this country needs it?

It is now claimed there is more orderly production than two years ago, that wells are no longer running wild, and that if orderly pro rata production can be maintained it will serve a good purpose. I agree to all that, but this plan has not yet proven effective. Only some States follow it. It is a prospect, or rather it is a hope, that something can be done through State law by the different States coordinating and limiting the production to consumptive demands.

NEW FARM RELIEF

This is a new kind of farm relief. The plea now is the farmer. Well, two years ago we enacted a farm relief bill, and it worked just as we said it was going to work. It relieved six farmers who were appointed on the board, and they got about $12,000 a year help—yes; one out of a million. What percentage does this one propose to relieve? It is all a question of what percentage of farms produce oil as compared to those that do not produce oil.

I have been searching the records hastily to find some record on that subject, and I have not been able to find it; but I can speak from knowledge and observation, and so can every Senator here. If you should travel 3,000 miles across the continent, and you passed over a strip of oil land 3 miles wide, the whole width of the continent, then one one-thousandth part would be oil. But you do not pass through any such strip. You pass through spots of oil. Certainly it is a very conservative statement that for every farmer who gets a royalty out of oil, nine hundred and ninety-nine must contribute. Therefore, we are relieving one at the expense of nine hundred and ninety-nine, and we call that farm relief!

What is the burden going to be? It is difficult, of course, to forecast what it is going to be; but no one here denies that if the tariff on oil is effective, there will have to be an increase of a cent a gallon in the price of gasoline. The best I can figure it is that it will be very conservative to say that that means $10 on every farmer in the land. It will cost the other farmers $10,000 to relieve one a little bit. Does that farmer get the $10,000? He gets only a very small part of it, of course. The promoter, the middleman, the big oil company, will get the bulk of it. So that is the way to have farm relief! Tax one thousand farmers for the benefit of one farmer, and then give 90 per cent of the tax to somebody else who is not a farmer! That is the kind of farm relief that is in this bill. [Laughter.]

We hear much about cutthroat competition in the oil business, unfortunately. That was the thing that was told me two years ago when I went into this problem—that if we could shut out Venezuelan oil, we would still be hopeful except for the fact that the wolves controlled a good part of the storage and the production here, and it was the Americans that were breaking the market; it was not the Venezuelans. It was the American oil companies that produced oil in Venezuela for the purpose, they said, of depressing the market here; and they said, "Protect us against them." On the other hand, they admitted that those same people have the American oil, and the tariff might not be effective. I said, "Why do you want the tariff?" They said, "Well, we can not think of anything else." That was the excuse.

When we take the chart of the Tariff Commission and find that practically two-thirds of the oil of the whole world is produced in the southwestern part of the United States of America, that those fields are new and virgin, they are not exhausted yet but probably will be in 20 years, then we have another problem.

Whom are we to protect against? We find that 20 per cent of the countries of the world produce some oil and do not export any. This tariff is not to protect against them. We produce nearly two-thirds. They produce over 20 per cent. But there are a few countries that produce a little over 15 per cent of the oil of the world that do not use quite all of their oil, and from those countries there is some imported into this country—the oil that is supposed to create the problem.

I wish we could give everyone a fair wage and a fair earning power. I am one of those who do not think it is impossible. I think in this land of plenty, with such wonderful resources, with such an abundance of people willing to work, with such a hardy and thrifty race, and such an advanced stage of civilization, we have very little excuse for permitting this condition to exist. I look upon it as nothing but a lack of coordination.

There is no reason why we can not have a day's earnings for every person in the land who wants to work, but we can not have that condition by taxing nine hundred and ninety-nine farmers for the benfit of one farmer. We can not have that by the oil companies going out and levying tribute on the land, even though it will help the oil business, even though we want to help the oil business.

We are always told, "We will help you next time." We have been promised that ever since I came here, and that has been a long time. "We will help you next time." In the 1924 Republican convention, at Cleveland, we received the only definite promise we have ever received.

The promise was to restore equality between agriculture, industry, and labor. There are just two ways in which equality can be restored. One is by trying to get everyone up to a good American level, a good high standard. With our resources, we are entitled to live on a higher level than the rest of the world, and the question is whether our efforts should be in that direction or whether we should try to put some favored group upon a higher level.

I say that if we do that, we will fail. The only result will be to drag everybody down to an undesirable level; and if we follow that policy, the bottom has not been hit. We will drag everybody down until all find the same place, and then we will start rising slowly together.

Of course, the country is coming back; it is sure to come back. But it would come back more quickly, and the distress would be less if we could work out some policy that would lead at an early date to the average family having an average income. Nobody would lose by that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dickinson	Kean	Sheppard
Austin	Dill	Keyes	Shipstead
Barbour	Fess	King	Shortridge
Barkley	Frazier	La Follette	Smith
Bingham	George	Lewis	Smoot
Blaine	Glenn	Long	Steiwer
Bratton	Goldsborough	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Gore	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Hale	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Harrison	Moses	Trammell
Bulow	Hastings	Neely	Tydings
Capper	Hatfield	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Carey	Hawes	Norris	Walcott
Cohen	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Connally	Hebert	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Howell	Pittman	Watson
Copeland	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if anybody else wants to speak in behalf of the tariff on oil, I shall be very glad to yield to him because I can speak now or later just as well.

I am going to make one appeal to the leadership on the other side of the aisle. The responsibility for the retention of the tariffs into this tax bill must lie squarely upon the shoulders of the leaders of the majority party. There are Democrats who feel impelled, because of their conviction that a tariff upon oil, upon copper, and upon other products would be helpful and indeed, necessary for the preservation of the industries of their States and sections to ask, of course, for tariffs upon those products. But the responsibility for retaining these tariff items into the tax bill lies squarely—and must lie squarely—upon the shoulders of the administration leaders in the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I have no desire, of course, to inject a partisan controversy into this matter, but is it not a fact that when the tariff bill came over to us from the House of Representatives it had in it a tariff on oil and a tariff on coal?

Mr. GEORGE. That is a fact, Mr. President; but it is also a fact that some of the minority members of the Finance Committee undertook to exclude from the revenue bill all tariff items, and but for the consistent votes of the administration leaders, those items would have gone out of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield first to the Senator from Utah, who rose first.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not a fact that if the whole Democratic vote in the committee had been cast against those items, they would not have gone into the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I said that there were some Democrats who, from conviction, and because they felt the necessity of protecting the interests of their States and their sections, were voting for these items.

Mr. SMOOT. And if it had not been for their votes the items could not have been included.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. But the majority party has had it in its power at every moment since this bill came to the Senate to strike them from the bill. Now, if there is any leader of the administration who wishes to controvert that statement, I invite him to do so.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is it not a fact that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a good Democrat, was one of the sponsors of the proposal for a tariff of 1 cent a gallon on oil?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know about that; but I am not going to criticize or to comment upon what the House has done. We are not responsible for the actions of the House. We are responsible for our conduct here. We are responsible for the policies which we adopt. We do not control the House, and we do not assume to criticize House action.

Why oil and coal were inserted in the House is a matter upon which I do not care to comment here. It is a proper subject of comment, perhaps, but I have no such definite information as would enable me to comment upon it, nor have I any disposition to do so.

I come back to the proposition that upon the administration leadership in the Finance Committee must rest the responsibility for the injection of tariff items into the tax bill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Again disavowing any thought or purpose of arousing any partisan discussion in this matter, if my poll is correct, there are 18 Democrats for these tariff rates and 18 Republicans against them, as will be seen when the vote is taken, if I am correctly informed. So that, after all, our Democratic friends will help keep the tariff items in the bill if they are kept in it.

Mr. GEORGE. That may be true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it not a fact that the place to have eliminated these tariffs was in the Committee on Finance, and that the votes cast by the Republican leadership sitting at the head of the table of the Finance Committee were the votes which put the tariffs into the bill? The roll calls will demonstrate that fact.

I pleaded with the leadership on this side of the Chamber, because I predicted the very situation which has developed here, and which threatens to delay the pending tax bill, which the same gentlemen who have injected these tariff items into the bill have been bellowing to the country must be passed if we are to preserve the credit of the Government of the United States. We have all heard that hue and cry. But assuming that the Senator from Indiana is right, the votes of the gentlemen who sit at the head of the Finance Committee table on the Republican side were the votes which put these tariffs into the bill, and finally when we knocked them out they were the votes which put them back in. The most disgraceful kind of logrolling I ever witnessed in any committee of the Congress took place right across the table while the rolls were being called.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to deny that to the Republican Party is due the credit for putting this tariff on oil into this bill. It is giving the Republican Party credit to which it is not entitled. I charge that Democrats were the originators of this tariff, the Democratic House, a Democratic committee in the House, Democratic statesmen, and a Democrat from the State of Texas, and I deny that the Republican Party is entitled to credit for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield only for questions, not for speeches.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia yields only for a question.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. All I wish to say in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin is that every one of the Senators who sat at the head of the table on the Republican side voted first, last, and all the time for the amendment. They never changed their idea at all and have not changed it upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I could not understand the Senator's last statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator understand my first statement?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state it again. In answer to the Senator from Wisconsin I will state that every Senator referred to by him who sat at the head of the table voted for this amendment first, last, and all the time. There was no change made at any time on any vote. So far as I am personally concerned, I am ready and willing to take the responsibility. I do not ask any one to excuse me in any way. I have no apology to offer. It is for a majority of the Senate of the United States to say whether the amendment shall remain in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish to cut to pieces the argument of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I had not begun my argument.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon for having injected this matter at this time. I shall discuss it in my own time when I speak on the matter, but I just wish to say now that the records on the desk of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] will show that two conservative Republican Senators from New England did switch their votes on the oil tariff after there had been an adjustment of it made across the table which justified the characterization which I made of it a few moments ago.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Not only was there a switch on oil but there was a switch on copper and there was a switch on lumber, and I will clarify the situation with reference to that by reading the names as they appear in the record. I expect to do that before the debate is over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has tried to snatch this dubious glory for Democratic Senators. I am far from denying him any glory that he may get out of it or any Democrats of any glory that they may get out of it, but I am far from criticizing any individual Democrat for his position. I said in the beginning that there were Democrats, distinguished Members of this body, whose States were peculiarly affected by one or more of these industries and that they felt it necessary to protect such industries at this time; that they were convinced that there should be tariffs upon the products of these particular industries within their States and within the sections of the country represented by them. That is all true enough, and nothing that I now say, and nothing that I shall hereafter say is intended to be or can be rightfully construed as anything but a different viewpoint between honorable Members of this body over this economic question of tariffs.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me finish my statement. While there were two or three of the Democrats who were convinced that they should ask for tariff duties upon particular products, the responsibility, of course, must rest where the distinguished Senator from Utah has admitted it to rest, upon the majority members of the committee, because they had it in their power—not only did they have it in their power but they were invited and had the opportunity, as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has stated, to strike these particular duties out of the bill. They did not do so.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not true that whenever any tariff bill is under consideration in the Senate we find exactly the same situation? I can point to Senators on the other side who voted for protection when we had tariff bills before us. I do not want to mention names at all, but the Senators know.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not new in this situation.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true. I am not talking about what happened in previous tariff bills. I am talking about what is happening now. The President of the United States has it within his power to eliminate these tariff duties if he is disposed to do so.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. How would the President of the United States proceed to do that?

Mr. GEORGE. I think the President of the United States as the leader of his party could remind his party that the primary obligation of the Senate is to protect the credit of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. That he has said many times, and urged Congress to hasten in the discharge of their obligations.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Indiana, the distinguished leader, wishes to leave the implication that the President of the United States is not the responsible head of his party, then I accept the implication.

Mr. WATSON. The President of the United States is the leader of his party; but quite naturally the President of the United States does not see fit to thrust himself into every legislative situation that presents itself. I have had no discussion with the President of the United States as to whether the tariff rates should be left in or taken out of the bill, because I considered that was our business.

Furthermore, inasmuch as so many votes were taken on the question in the committee, and inasmuch as opinion here has been so thoroughly crystallized by private conversations, I assumed the President of the United States could not have changed any of the votes if he had wanted to; but it never occurred to me to ask him to have those votes changed, because in reality under the conditions I did not want the votes changed.

Mr. GEORGE. I accept the implication, Mr. President, that the President of the United States has lost his influence as the leader of his own party. I am compelled to go further and say that he has lost influence with his party's leader in this body.

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator that he has not tried to exert his influence over me on this question at all. I am very glad that he has not.

Mr. GEORGE. I am prepared to accept the Senator's statement that he has not undertaken to exert his influence.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. This being a revenue measure, I assume we have a right to look to sources of additional revenue. From my point of view, neither the rate as reported by the Senate Finance Committee as to coal, as to oil, as to copper, or as to lumber, is a protective rate. I think, however, it would be a revenue-raising source for additional revenue, which the Government sadly needs. Now can not the distinguished, thoughtful Senator from Georgia and can not other perhaps equally thoughtful Democratic Members of this body go along and let these items remain in the bill as purely revenue-raising items; for, to repeat, personally I think they have no protective features at all. If I were urging a protection for coal or oil or copper or lumber, I should urge far greater duties that are in the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I am quite sure the Senator from California would, because the Senator from California is a consistent protectionist, and I am not quarreling with him about his philosophy.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Nor am I quarreling with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. But I am inviting the Senator and all Senators to observe what has taken place.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me a moment longer?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It has been said that this is a tariff item, and that it may not originate here in the Senate by way of amendment. A bill regulating immigration may yield some revenue; a bill concerning the disposal of our public lands may yield revenue; but they are not "bills for raising revenue" in the contemplation of the Constitution, and therefore they may originate here. So if we could agree, and I hope we may agree before 10 o'clock to-night—rising above party, remembering what a great Democratic statesman said, that he serves his party best who serves his country best—if we could remember and be influenced by that wise utterance and lay aside all partisanship; if we could agree as to these four items that they are purely revenue-raising items rather than protective in the sense of a protective tariff, could not the Senator join in letting these four items remain in the bill as revenue-raising items?

Mr. GEORGE. Let me invite the distinguished Senator from California to remember what a great Democrat said—that he who serves his country best serves his party best.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Truly.

Mr. GEORGE. And let me invite the majority Members of the Senate to lay aside these purely tariff items, whether they are altogether protective or in part revenue-producing measures, and let us finish the work before us. The Senator from California is most gracious in inviting us, who likewise have very definite and fixed convictions, to forego our objection and to allow coal and oil and copper and lumber to come into the bill under the rates proposed. But I am suggesting to him that he be quite as gracious as he invites us to be and himself waive his insistence upon the inclusion of these particular tariff items in the bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. GEORGE. I pause until the Senator responds.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would not ask the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator of like mind to yield his views and his convictions as to the tariff problem. But this is the proposition, namely, that these items are not primarily "protective-tariff" items, according to my view; they are essentially and designedly revenue-raising items.

Mr. GEORGE. Upon that we differ; thus differing and both being conscientious, may I not again invite the distinguished Senator from California to lay these items aside and let us raise the revenue which the country so sorely needs?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would gladly, but for this final thought. Holding as I do that these items are not protective, and that therefore we need not get into a controversy over the two great theories of tariff legislation, if we could agree that they are essentially revenue-raising measures and that the Government is in sad need of additional revenue—if we could so agree—then I venture to suggest—and to express the hope—that the Senator from Georgia and others of like mind will agree to this proposition, namely: We need revenue; these are not protective-tariff items, but they will raise revenue, and we are here seeking additional revenue. If we can so agree, why not let this and other revenue-raising items remain in the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. We are thoroughly agreed upon the statement that we are here to raise revenue; that the country sorely needs the revenue. The distinguished Senator conceives the tariff items in the bill as being purely revenue items, but there are those of us who differ from him on that proposition. So the situation has developed that we are now engaged in a tariff fight; and if any Senator here doubts it, let him rise and say so. It has come to that. Without any criticism of those who think that these items ought to be in the bill, and conceding that they may be right, there are those of us who do not think they should be in this bill, and we have reached an impasse. We have reached it not over any item that is undoubtedly a revenue item only, but we have reached it over these tariff matters.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I just——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me finish this statement, and then I shall be glad to yield to the distinguished Senator, as I always am.

We have reached an impasse; it is plain and it is unmistakable. The distinguished leader of the Republican Party has gone out of the Chamber. He is content to leave the clear implication that the President of the United States is not in control of the majority party when we have reached an impasse upon so important an issue as providing revenue for the Government, when the Government's credit is at stake, because, forsooth, some of us wish to inject tariff matters into the bill, and some of us, let us say without any adequate justification and excuse, do not think they should be injected into the bill. Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, a final word, though I am violating my promise in again interrupting the Senator. Take the item of oil. California is a great oil-producing State. In Kern County, in the town of Bakersfield, is published a newspaper which is known as the Bakersfield Californian. It is edited and published by Mr. Alfred Harrell, one of the finest citizens of these United States. He is a lifelong Democrat; he believes in the policies of the Democratic Party; he is a gentleman and a scholar. In a recent editorial in his paper, commenting upon the action of the Senate Committee on Finance in reducing the rate on oil of 1 cent a gallon, as fixed by the House, to one-half cent, he says, not abandoning his theories upon tariff legislation, that the rate even as fixed by the House, and certainly the rate as approved by our committee would be giving to the industry no protection whatever, not even a half loaf, and can only be supported upon the theory that it will at this juncture yield some revenue for the Government. I merely refer to this Democratic editorial to show that this friend of mine, a good Democrat, differs from the distinguished Senator from Georgia. It is urged that items of this kind may be considered in this bill and approved without any stultification or abandonment of theory on the part of Members of the Congress or without any embarrassment before their several constituencies or before the entire American people.

I only rose to interrupt and to express the hope that thoughtful Senators might look upon these items as purely revenue-raising measures, and we would avoid controversy or discussion or difference of opinion touching the two great theories of tariff legislation; but, perhaps, I am indulging in a hope not to be realized.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I regret to say to the Senator that he is indulging in a hope that not one man in this country could have from the beginning thought it possible to realize. He is indulging in a hope that no Senator on this floor can safely indulge, because these are tariff items, and whether the rate be one that will produce revenue only, with an incidental protection, or whether the rate in a given instance be a protective rate, is a question over which we might differ. The distinguished Democrat to whom the Senator has referred I have no doubt is quite honest in his opinion; in fact, I have never questioned the sincerity of the oil producers as they have appeared here before our committee, and, as I have had the pleasure of talking to some of them about their industry and their problem, I have never questioned their sincerity or their absolute conviction that a tariff would be beneficial to the industry; but I must say to the Senator that I would not be willing for the distinguished Democrat on the west coast to assume my responsibility and write a duty which he wished to write affecting an industry in which he has an interest, direct or indirect.

His view of the matter is his view, and he has a right to it, but the obligation resting upon Senators here can be discharged only by themselves, and whoever is right and without regard to which side is in error, the condition in the Senate is clear and unmistakable. We have reached a conflict over tariff items in the tax bill, and the responsibility for those items rests upon the majority party.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask whether the Senator thinks that we can or can not enter into some stipulation to vote at a given hour, giving the several Senators ample time to express their views?

Mr. GEORGE. I can only speak for myself. For myself, I would be willing to do so; but I want to say in all frankness to the Senator—I would be uncandid if I did not—that the fight on these tariff items has just begun.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Having participated in the tariff battle of 1930, I can realize what that means.

Mr. GEORGE. The fight has just begun upon the first amendment to the first item.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was hoping, of course, that we would come to some agreement to the end of reaching a vote; of course, giving Senators ample time to express their views.

Mr. GEORGE. I should be glad to join the Senator in expressing that hope; but I do not think he ought to ask those of us here to lay down our convictions in relation to matters that we believe will adversely affect our constituents; and if the Senators believe that they must insist upon tariffs at this particular time and in this measure can not lay down their convictions, then we have simply come to the point where we must fight it out.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, if Senators think that any rate suggested now in the bill would be hurtful to their constituents or to the Nation as a people, I would not ask any one of them to abandon his views or to cease to fight to defeat such measures.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator does me very little honor, but I am sure it is unintentional, when he thinks that I would open my mouth to discuss a single item in this revenue bill if I did not believe that the interests of the country were really involved.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I meant no such implication. I was poorly expressing the thought that if Senators could agree that the tariff items were purely revenue measures and would do no more than raise revenue and not strike down or injuriously affect other industries in the Nation we might come to an agreement. But, of course, if my learned friend from Georgia thinks that the rates on any one of these items would be hurtful to Georgia, or to any other State in the Union, I would not ask him to abandon his views.

Mr. GEORGE. I am sure the Senator would not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would be the last man in this body to want to do such a thing.

Mr. GEORGE. That emphasizes the statement that I have repeatedly made that we have reached the point where we simply have to prolong this contest at an unhappy hour, but I am quite sure that I could wish that it was not before the Senate.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Observing the statement of the Senator from Georgia relative to the leadership with respect to the inclusion of tariff items in this bill and his statement that the responsibility must be accepted by the Republican Party, let me say that I think the Senator will agree that the vigorous, able, and persistent fight to incorporate in the bill these so-called tariff items has been led by members of his own party.

Mr. GEORGE. I said so.

Mr. GLENN. I think the Senator from Georgia will agree that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] has continued in this session the very able and intelligent fight which he made during the last Congress for a tariff upon oil; that both the distinguished Senators from Texas, Democrats of course, have occupied much of the time in their thorough discussion of this question and in arguments for a tariff on oil; that the vigorous and entertaining Senator from Louisiana, the leader of the Democratic Party in that State and Democratic national committeeman from Louisiana, has occupied much of the time in this discussion advocating this, the first of the so-called tariff items.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. GLENN. Is it not true—and I do not want to take up much time——

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator will not restrain himself.

Mr. GLENN. Is it not true that the situation is involved and mixed between Republicans and Democrats both in the Senate and in the House, with the Democratic Speaker of the House and the leader of his party leading the fight there in that body?

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator will not discuss the House membership, because of our rules which forbid it.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator from Georgia was not so delicate about discussing the President of the United States a few moments ago. Why should we refrain from discussing the Speaker of the House? He is not a thin-skinned person who would be offended at all, and I assume that he is proud of the position he is taking now as a high-tariff advocate when the article which the tariff affects is a product of Texas. After all, does the Senator from Georgia believe that he can correctly place the responsibility for this tariff fight upon one party or the other? Are they not all either entitled to share in the glory or to be involved in the ignominy which may follow?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should be glad to answer the Senator from Illinois. I do not undertake to place the responsibility for the tariff fight upon either party. That fight has been going on for quite a number of years. In the army on one side or the other frequently appear Republicans and Democrats, and one can not at any one time say that the whole of either party was on the one side or the other on the tariff controversy. The Senator is quite right in saying that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], now ably assisted by his colleague in this body, the able junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], has been most active in the effort to obtain a tariff on oil.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me answer the Senator first.

Mr. GLENN. I merely wish to say——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me answer the Senator. He is quite right in saying that the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has been quite active in undertaking to secure protection upon oil, and he has referred to the delightful and distinguished Senator from Louisiana, who has also been very active in an effort to procure what he believes to be an adequate, fair, and just tariff upon oil. The Senator from Louisiana, however, is not the President of the United States, nor is he a member of the majority party. The distinguished Senators from Oklahoma and from Texas are not members of the majority party in this body.

Mr. GLENN. That was the only interruption I desired to make. I did not refer to the junior Senator from Oklahoma a moment ago because I was not in the Chamber when he spoke. I did not intend to ignore him.

Mr. GEORGE. I am sure the Senator is correct in his statement; but I did not feel at liberty to pass over the junior Senator from Oklahoma because he is an able advocate, with his colleague, of the duty upon this commodity.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. So far as the party's attitude in this matter is concerned, speaking for myself, I have no desire to escape the responsibility, so far as I had influence, for inserting these items in this bill. I am a protectionist.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I never said that the Senator had attempted to escape it.

Mr. WATSON. Not only that, but the Republican Party is a protective-tariff party. It has not been anything else, and if it is not that, it is not anything.

Mr. GEORGE. I have said nothing at all to the contrary.

Mr. WATSON. I understand. Furthermore, I had very much rather be responsible for inserting these items in a tariff bill than for delaying the passage of this bill, because I regard it as essential that this bill shall be passed promptly.

Mr. GEORGE. So do I. I think the Senator is quite right about it.

Mr. WATSON. We should pass the appropriation bills promptly.

Mr. GEORGE. We are in thorough agreement on that.

Mr. WATSON. There is no doubt about that. The Senator and I agree about it.

Mr. GEORGE. All that I have said is that the responsibility for the delay, and the responsibility for the failure to pass this bill promptly, must rest upon the shoulders of the majority party, because we have reached a stage in the consideration of this bill where we are at odds over these tariff items in the bill; that is all.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment further?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. I wish to announce that the colloquy between the Senator and myself was not intended to indicate my opposition to the view of the Senator from Georgia relative to the advisability of inserting these items in this revenue bill. I think there is great weight in the position which the Senator from Georgia takes relative to that. I may be with him when the vote comes on this matter.

Mr. GEORGE. I am sure that I did not understand that the Senator has approved the insertion of the tariff items in the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I take it that it is important to direct our attention to the consideration of this revenue bill. I take it that it is important to balance the Federal Budget. I take it that every Senator here desires to cooperate to that end. I take it that every advocate of every protective duty is honest and sincere in his conviction that the particular industries should receive consideration at this time. But it is absolutely clear that there are Senators in the body who also believe it to be their duty to resist these tariff items in the bill. That is all there is to that discussion. The responsibility rests somewhere; and if it does not rest upon the majority party, where can it rest?

I am quite sure that my colleagues on this side who believe they should insist upon these items in this bill are willing to take their share of the responsibility; but they are not of the majority party. Not one of them is the President of the United States. Not one of them has it in his power to bring this matter to an end, because if they did, they would long since have persuaded us, with their very able arguments, that we were wrong, that they were entitled to the protection asked, and we would have done the gracious thing that the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] has asked us to do, to wit, supinely surrender our convictions in order to give to the President of the United States and to the majority party the privilege of including in a revenue act whatever tariff items they wish.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator is so eminently fair always that I know he wants to be fair in this instance.

Mr. GEORGE. I certainly do.

Mr. WATSON. The Ways and Means Committee has a clear majority of Democratic members. That is the committee where tariffs originate. There is not a solitary Republican from an oil-producing State on that committee. They put the tariff on oil in that committee. They put the tariff on coal in that committee. The bill came over to the Senate with those two items in it. We had to deal with them; and all that the Republicans did, with the help of some of my Democratic friends on the other side, was to insert copper and lumber in the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose, then, the Senator's position is that we must accept whatever the House sends us; that if they put in an item on oil or on coal we must accept it.

Mr. WATSON. No; but the Senator says that the Republican Party is solely responsible for the insertion of these items in this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me strike out "insertion" and insert in lieu of it "retention in this bill," if the objection is verbal.

Mr. WATSON. Then let us get at the fact. The bill came over with those two items in it. It came to our committee; and if it had not been for Democratic votes in that committee they could have been stricken out.

Mr. GEORGE. How many Democrats voted for them?

Mr. WATSON. That depends on the item. I do not like to mention names on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not like to mention names, and that is the reason why I have not read the roll call here; but the Senator says that if it had not been for Democratic votes the items would have been stricken out. I say that if it had not been for the votes of the majority party they would have been stricken out.

Mr. WATSON. Why, of course.

Mr. GEORGE. If you had recognized the right of the Democrats themselves to have controlled these items they would have been out of the bill. The Senator does not dispute that, does he?

Mr. WATSON. Why, not at all. The Republicans could have stricken them out of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I want to put it the other way. If the Republicans had not voted for those items, and had left it to the Democrats, they would have been out, would they not?

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true. If the Republicans had gone out and left the committee and left it to the Democrats they would have voted them out.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I have stated that the Republican Party must assume the responsibility for retaining the items in the bill. That is all I have said.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator wants to put it that way, I am entirely willing to take the responsibility for helping to keep them in.

Mr. GEORGE. I so understood the Senator. I understood that. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] took exactly the same position. There ought not to be any controversy about it, and there is not any controversy between the Senator from Utah and myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I just wanted to make a correction of a statement that I made, having forgotten the last vote that was taken when the change was made; and I had in mind also the statement which the Senator made about who was at the head of the table. The Senator remembers what happened; and I want to state that there were two Republicans who made the change in the last votes that were taken.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to have the Senator make the statement. I do not think I referred to the head of the table. I think that was another Senator who spoke in my time and by my permission.

Mr. SMOOT. It was the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, I want to address myself briefly to the tariff items in this bill.

The first is—

Crude petroleum, one-half cent per gallon; fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil and gasoline or other motor fuel, one-half cent per gallon.

There is your basic rate.

Gasoline or other motor fuel, 2½ cents per gallon—

A purely protective rate. Indeed, Mr. President, it is a compensatory rate. It is confessedly a compensatory tariff rate in this bill.

Lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound; natural asphalt and asphalt and bitumen derived from petroleum, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

There is a complete oil schedule, with compensatory duties inserted into that schedule.

Now let us consider briefly the other items:

Coal:

Coal of all sizes, grades, and classifications, coke manufactured therefrom; and coal or coke briquettes, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, and shall not be imposed upon any such article if during the preceding calendar year the exports of the articles described in this paragraph from the United States to the country from which such article is imported have been greater in quantity than the imports into the United States from such country of the articles described in this paragraph.

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, $3 per thousand feet, board measure.

Translated into an ad valorem duty, it is a duty of considerable size. Not only is that true, but lumber already bears a duty. This is an additional duty, a duty upon lumber which escaped the description in the Smoot-Hawley Act. It is a pure tariff measure. It does not partake at all of the character or nature of a revenue tax.

But the tax on the articles described in this paragraph—shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

That is to say, lumber—

Copper:

Copper-bearing ores and concentrates and articles provided for—

I ask the Senate to note this—in paragraph 316, 380, 381, 387, 1620, 1634, 1657, 1658, or 1659 of the tariff act of 1930, 4 cents per pound on the copper contained therein: Provided, That no tax under this paragraph shall be imposed on copper in any of the foregoing which is lost in metallurgical processes. All articles dutiable under the tariff act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this paragraph, in which copper (including copper in alloys) is the component material of chief value, 3 cents per pound. All articles dutiable under the tariff act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this paragraph, containing 4 per cent or more of copper by weight, 3 per cent ad valorem or three-fourths of 1 cent per pound, whichever is the lower. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe all necessary regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph.

Mr. President, without enumerating all of the articles, some 65 specific articles containing copper are given protection, as I now recall, under the Smoot-Hawley Act. That is to say, this is not only a tariff upon copper, upon ore, but it is a compensatory tariff carried to 65 copper products, or articles composed in part of copper.

It will be noted that there is a tax of 4 cents a pound imposed on copper and of 3 cents a pound upon the articles of which copper is a component or chief part. Copper has sold within the week in New York for less than 6 cents a pound. If my recollection is correct, it has sold for around 5 cents per pound. Yet here is a duty, a revenue duty, if you please, of 4 cents a pound, or an ad valorem rate of 80 per cent, placed in a tax bill and paraded before the public as a pure revenue-producing tariff.

I congratulate the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], I congratulate the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] upon their frank and candid statement that these rates are protective rates. They can be denounced as none other, they can be defended as none other, and I congratulate the Senators upon their candor.

There may be some dispute as to whether or not the rate upon oil is protective; but when we look at the whole oil schedule inserted in this tax bill, it must be openly confessed that it is a protective measure; and, conceding full faith to any Senator who believes in the protective theory or even high protection, others must concede like good faith to those of us who believe that the time has come when for the sake and salvation of the country we must insist upon reasonable tariffs, we must insist upon some check in tariff making when the world is lying prostrate upon its back with no chance of recovery unless governments exercise a fair degree of discretion and restraint. We must not be asked to lie down and surrender our convictions while others reserve unto themselves the right to insist upon tariff items—protective-tariff items with rates equivalent to 80 per cent ad valorem upon one of the products protected by this bill.

Mr. President, I do not hope to convert anyone. When the Smoot-Hawley bill was ready to be submitted to the President of the United States, literally more than a thousand economists made an earnest appeal to the President to veto that bill. I dare say that so large a group of economists never before agreed upon any one proposition in the history of the world. Literally more than a thousand addressed an earnest appeal to the President of the United States to disapprove that measure. They represented all shades of political thought. They were not all Democrats or all Republicans. It has been my belief that the President of the United States would have preferred not to give his approval to that bill, but he did approve it, and he declared that he was happy to approve it; therefore, of course, his statement must be taken as true. But the point is that one thousand and one economists addressed an earnest appeal to the President. They warned him that that tariff act would destroy the trade and commerce of this country. They warned him that that tariff act would constitute an insuperable obstruction in the channels of world trade and commerce. But a country gone mad on the protective theory would not listen to that solemn warning.

What has happened? During the first three months of this year our international trade declined more than 68 per cent as compared with the first three months of 1929.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AUSTIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. That did not come about from the amount of goods imported into the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think the Senator and myself can agree wholly upon that.

Mr. SMOOT. I have here——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not care to have the Senator put into the RECORD now the table or other matter he has in his hand. I will be glad for him to put it in a little later.

I understand that there was a decline in commodity prices, but I also know that the Department of Commerce is authority for the statement that our exports, as well as our imports, have declined, although the exports do not show the same percentage of decline. I think that is what the Senator wished to say.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not what I wished to say. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we had collected in 1932, from customs, up to day before yesterday, $301,604,687.58. Up to the same day in the year 1931 we had collected only $336,892,003.69. So, as far as our importations are concerned, the Senator can see that there is a difference of between 10 and 11 per cent in the amounts we have collected, notwithstanding the decrease in the value of goods shipped from foreign countries into the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is comparing the figures of to-day with the figures of 1931.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. After the tariff act had done its work. I was comparing the foreign commerce of this country in 1929 with the corresponding months of 1932.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the commerce of the world has decreased.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The values of all commodities have decreased.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. I had no objection to the Senator putting his figures in; but he is comparing corresponding months in 1931 with 1932, when the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act had done its disastrous work. I am comparing the 1929 months with the 1932 months. There has been a continuous decline, even through 1931 and 1932, in both our exports and our imports.

I am quite well aware of the fact that there has been a general dislocation of trade and commerce throughout the world. That is one of the things the economists told us would happen. That is one of the things we were advised would happen. But that is a thing which the group devoted to exceedingly high tariff duties refused, and persistently refused, to see.

It was inevitable. The great country we are, with our great production, with our great trade and commerce, could not become stagnant without affecting the balance of the world. Nor could we hope to escape the responsibility for our own leadership, at least leadership by precept, by example, of the other nations of the world.

When we were considering the Smoot-Hawley Act we called upon the State Department to advise us what protests had been received from foreign countries. The State Department responded. The response was very disheartening. But my distinguished friend from Utah and the other leaders on the other side who believe as he does in high protection, reminds us that similar threats were always made, and that we ought not to yield to them; but that, on the contrary, we ought to resent them, and they actually turned the great volume of protests into an argument in favor of the high rates in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator was a Member of the Senate in 1909 or not.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I was not.

Mr. SMOOT. I begin with 1909, because that was when I became a member of the Committee on Finance. Not only did the foreign countries protest at that time but they asked that their representatives be allowed to appear before the committee, and the committee went so far as to allow the foreign countries' representatives to come before the Finance Committee in person. It is nothing new for a foreign country to protest against a tariff rate. There has never been a revenue bill considered—and I think I might say a tariff bill—but that foreign nations have protested, and they will protest as long as there is any kind of a tariff barrier against their countries.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is perhaps correct, especially when those tariffs are unreasonable and unnecessarily burdensome.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us go to 1913. That is when the Democrats were in power.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is going back beyond my day; but I am willing to accept his recollection about it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question, whether it was 1913, in a tariff made by the Democratic Party, or at some other time when other tariff bills were passed by the Republicans, but that foreign countries protested against the duties imposed.

Let us take Italy, for example. The Senator knows what protests there were from Italy against the tariff on olive oil, and I think that the duty on olive oil that was agreed to was too high, and so does the Senator think so.

Mr. GEORGE. I certainly do.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I add that we are not guiltless in the matter, because we have just been making protests to the Government of France against the quotas which they sought to impose upon certain imports of American origin.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right. Not only are tariffs offensive to other nations when they become burdensome upon the commerce and trade of those nations, but quota restrictions and the licensing system, both of which devices have had remarkable growth and development even since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Act, give offense to nations, and we have protested against certain of the quotas fixed by France.

Mr. President, it is exactly these constantly arising tariff walls all about the world, these constantly multiplying protests from all of the producing and commercial countries of the world, that ought to give us at least warning that the course which we and other nations are disposed to follow at this time with reference to customs laws should be very carefully examined and that assuredly somebody must be expected to examine them whenever they are presented in a legislative body, and therefore they ought not to be presented in a bill of the vital importance of this particular measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that I shall not discuss with the Senator; but I wanted to say this to the Senator now, if he will yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. When the Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration the protests that were received from foreign countries were just the same as have always been received against any tariff bill here. I suppose Australia made the strongest protest and in the most bitter words. When we came to look into their tariff, taking it as a whole it was higher than the one we were adopting.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator means now?

Mr. SMOOT. No; at the time the bill was under consideration.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will admit that it is very much higher now?

Mr. SMOOT. I think they have increased, as all other countries have increased.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will also admit, while speaking of Australia, that they have given a great preference to products from England and Canada and against us?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. For instance, the duty on automobile chassis from Canadian factories—but American factories, nevertheless—into Australia is only 15 per cent, while the duty on the same article made by the same manufacturer in a United States factory is 32 per cent, as I recall the duties.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been the policy all the time in the past. The Senator knows that Australia, being so closely connected with England, has always given England the advantage.

Mr. GEORGE. No; the Senator is wrong. When we passed the Smoot-Hawley Act we did not have this great preference against us on our products. It was subsequent to that when Australia granted present preferential rates to British products.

Mr. SMOOT. She may have increased them slightly, but it has always been——

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator can not get away from it. Let me tell him again what happened. Australia gave to Ford chassis made in a foreign Ford factory a right to go into Australia upon the payment of a 15 per cent duty, but she collected on an identical Ford part 32 per cent as import duty into Australia if it was made in the United States. She raised her duty on American lumber and gave a $5 per thousand feet preference against American lumber, as I now recall the preference. Is there any wonder that our trade and commerce with Australia vanished overnight?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it has not vanished.

Mr. GEORGE. Virtually it has vanished.

Mr. SMOOT. She carried out her policy from the beginning and always will carry it out. England will always have an advantage so far as Australia is concerned. She always has had and I do not know of any reason why she should not have, because Australia is virtually under the control of England.

Mr. GEORGE. It gets us nowhere to dispute about the facts, but if the Senator will refresh his recollection he will see that these discriminatory differentials went into effect against us after the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Act, and yet we sit here and wonder what has happened to our commerce.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. For the first time in the course of this discussion a partisan note has been sounded, much to my regret, coming as it does from the high-minded and judicially temperamental Senator from Georgia. At the risk of violating some confidences, I am informed that there are votes enough here to keep the oil duty in the bill. That being the case we are immediately confronted with the task of reviewing all of the schedule and we shall have, to begin with, 500 typewritten amendments which now rest upon the desk of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

I have just inquired of the Senator from Maryland whether in those amendments he has one reducing the existing duties upon kaolin and high-grade clays, and I am assured by the Senator from Maryland that there is such an amendment to be proposed by him. I assume the Senator from Georgia will join the Senator from Maryland and me in supporting that amendment, inasmuch as the whole tariff list is now open to us.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall certainly join in a proportionate cut in all the tariff duties. It is a crude way of doing it, but it is a better way than not doing it at all in the face of the world crisis we now face.

Mr. MOSES. I rejoice at the conversion of the Senator from Georgia since the days we were discussing these duties when the Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration here.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me refresh the recollection of the Senator from New Hampshire. When we were discussing the Smoot-Hawley bill, for the purpose of punishing me and trying to deter me from making an honest fight to reduce many of these exorbitant rates, the Republican Members of the Finance Committee said, "We will reduce the duty upon a product down there in his State." I did not ask for an increase. I said then what I say now, if the Senator wants to accuse me of injecting a partisan note into this matter. I said then what I now say, that I will join him and his party in making a horizontal cut in every one of the tariff duties.

Mr. MOSES. I am sure the Senator is mistaken. However, as the thing goes on we shall see what the record will develop.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. If there is proposed a cut of 25 per cent on all your duties, although I confess that is a crude way to make tariffs, I will go with it. I said in the debate in 1929 and 1930 on kaolin, although it was singled out as one product in my State which received actual benefit from the tariff, that if you made a corresponding reduction in the duties upon products in New England and elsewhere, I would vote even for that cut.

Mr. MOSES. We had to take our reduction in New England anyway.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not injected a partisan note into this controversy. I have said that the responsibility for the injection of these tariff items, which always have been controverted between members of the two parties, must rest upon the majority party in the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. That was an assertion that was not backed up by anything the Senator said or by any of the facts. The Senator knows perfectly well that in the House——

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say anything about the House. I declined to discuss it. I said the retention of tariff duties in this bill was due to the vote of the majority members, and the Senator from Utah has admitted it, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has admitted it. It remains for the Senator from New Hampshire to say I had injected a partisan note into this question.

Mr. MOSES. I can find no other explanation for the opening sentence of the speech of the Senator from Georgia when he accused the Republicans of having brought the tariff question before the Senate. As a matter of fact, it was thrust upon us by whom? By what took place somewhere else—inasmuch as we may not refer to the House of Representatives. What took place somewhere else brought the thing here.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not injected a partisan note. I tried to detail the facts as they are. The roll calls are here. I do not want to read them.

Mr. MOSES. They will be read before the debate is finished, I am sure.

Mr. GEORGE. No doubt they will be. If to voice my honest conviction, if to stand here and make a fight I believe I am justified in making is partisanship, I am willing to assume that responsibility.

Mr. MOSES. I understand, and so does everyone else, that the Senator from Georgia is a sincere partisan. So am I. On the particular question now under discussion in the Senate I stand with the Senator from Georgia. I stand against this general proposition which he described so vehemently. I stand with him particularly on the amendment now under discussion. But I object bitterly to having the matter described in any sense as partisan, because it is bipartisan, just as every aspect of a tariff bill is bipartisan. General Hancock stated the entire truth when he said that the tariff is a local issue, and each one of us votes as he does because we want to satisfy our respective constituencies. The Senator from Georgia voted for duties on kaolin and clay. I voted for duties on textiles. Why? Because we try to represent the States, respectively, of Georgia and New Hampshire. We were simply performing our duties as Senators in taking that stand.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question just at this juncture?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I would like to attract the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire. May I have the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MOSES. I always give attention to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. As I understand it, the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Georgia have no misgivings whatever in joining their Democratic and Republican hands to get tariffs on articles of their respective States. Are they now willing to join hands to keep the State of Louisiana from getting a tariff on what we have in our State?

Mr. MOSES. But Louisiana does not have a duty on oil as yet.

Mr. LONG. That is what I say. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from New Hampshire have no trouble in joining their Republican and Democratic hands to get duties on the products of their States.

Mr. MOSES. To keep the duties we already have.

Mr. LONG. Are the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Georgia going to join hands, after they have gotten a tariff on their products in New Hampshire and Georgia, to keep the State of Louisiana from having a tariff on what we have down there in our State? Is that a fair position for even a partisan Democrat or a partisan Republican to take?

Mr. MOSES. I can not answer for the Senator from Georgia, but I do not intend to relinquish anything the State of New Hampshire has if I can help it.

Mr. LONG. Is not that a wonderful partisan spirit on the part of a Democrat and a Republican to obtain a tariff for themselves and refuse it for somebody else?

Mr. MOSES. This matter is not partisan. It is economic.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am attempting to discuss the question on its merits, since it is a tariff question. As to where the blame lies the country will be able to judge. Senators need not be mistaken about that. There will certainly be a reaction in the country as to where the blame is to rest for continuing this tariff fight, when it has developed into a tariff controversy.

Since it is a tariff matter, I propose to discuss, as best I can and as briefly as I can, what I believe to be its merits. As partisan as I am, I am not disposed to discuss this particular question from the standpoint of the man who disbelieves in all protection or from the standpoint of the man who believes in a tariff for revenue only; but I propose as best I can to discuss the question in the light of the facts as they exist at this time and in view of the extreme height to which we have carried our protective measures in this country, and particularly in view of the extreme height to which tariff protection has risen in other countries, other important producing and distributing countries of the globe.

I want to read the language of a distinguished cotton merchant. By common consent he is regarded as one of the greatest cotton merchants in the world. I dare say he is one of the best minds in the world. I quote:

> There are in the world two distinct schools of economic thought relating to commerce. One school, which may be termed "the protective school," seeks to control prices by artificial means. The methods commonly resorted to are agreements among producers for maintaning prices, for limiting production, for withholding supplies from the market, etc. This group is also quick to appeal to the Government for help through tariff legislation; and, in the case of agricultural products, by so-called stabilization operations with Government money and through compulsory reduction of acreage by statute. The philosophy of this school is that the operation of the law of supply and demand can be substantially modified and prices satisfactorily regulated by artificial means of restricting production, withholding supplies, or sewing up the markets.
> The other school of economic thought, which may be termed "the free school," holds to the belief that there are certain immutable natural laws underlying all economic activity which defy man's selfish efforts to secure an advantage for his particular activity at the expense of those engaged in other activities. This school recognizes that such efforts may momentarily appear to succeed, but holds that the very forces which generate temporary success are silently but ceaselessly and surely operating for eventual failure, if not disaster. Those engaged in the production of and distribution of raw cotton have always belonged to this school.
> During and since the Great War—

And this is the particular part that I wish to press upon the attention of the Senate—

> During and since the Great War, and largely as the result of the war, the protective school of thought gained almost complete ascendancy in commercial and political circles throughout the world. In consequence, the whole economic fabric was gravely weakened by having become saturated with artificiality to the point of refusal, and is now giving way under the stress and strain of the application of powerful forces which are making their way back to the natural and the normal.
>
> It is indeed a world crisis, as stupid and as inevitable, perhaps, as was the Great War. Looking back upon the events of the past 15 years, one wonders how any great people could have crowded so many major economic blunders into such a short space of time as we have done in the United States.
> Some sort of economic crisis would doubtless have followed the Great War in any case, but that it has been enormously intensified and prolonged by our own mistakes can not be intelligently questioned.

I am reading, Mr. President, the language of Mr. W. L. Clayton, a gentleman who has been honored with the confidence of the President of the United States, if press reports have accurately reflected the situation. It is not a question of high protection or tariffs for revenue nor of low tariffs, but it is a question of reasonable tariffs. It is a vital question that affects not only the prosperity of our own country but affects as well the prosperity of other countries, indeed, of the world.

We have not been the only sinner; it is unnecessary to say that we have been the chief offender; but it is proper to say that our example has had a definite and powerful influence on the building up of high tariff rates in every important country in the world. I need not refer to statistics, I need not make reference to the decline in foreign trade and commerce.

I did not mean to get into any controversy with the Senator from Utah by making casual reference to that matter; but it is proper for us to face the facts and to determine whether or not we are going to get out of this situation by a continuance of the policy that in a large measure has induced retaliatory action upon the part of other governments; that has simply honeycombed the nations of the earth with these protective barriers against each other, of course affecting our own commerce as well.

The distressing surpluses of raw and of manufactured products are to be found not in one country alone but in many countries. Trade and commerce can not flow in an even way in their accustomed channels when these obstructions continue to be piled one after another into the channels of trade and commerce. It seems to me that the high protectionist and the free trader alike or the low tariffists alike might certainly agree upon a general policy of reasonable rates of duty, of reasonable tariffs, in a sincere effort again to set in motion the flow of commerce between the nations. It seems to me that it is vital that we do so. Even if a given proposed tariff may within itself be defended as reasonable, I submit that at this time, in view of our experience in 1929 and 1930, and in view of the present attitude of the world toward us and of the several nations toward each other with respect to the matter of trade and commerce, we can not with safety propose any tariff that will not be taken either as an excuse or be acted on as a threat toward the trade and commerce of other countries. That is my position and that is what I wish to show.

Now, let me read from a news dispatch:

> Latins organizing union against us because of tariff. Peru and Chile already are near accord. Others are expected to join. Reprisals being prepared. Congress at Lima has bill for 300 per cent duty on imports from here ready for passage.

This is a special cable to the New York Times under date of May 12. I will not read the article but will ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

LATINS ORGANIZING UNION AGAINST US BECAUSE OF TARIFF—PERU AND CHILE ALREADY ARE NEAR ACCORD—OTHERS ARE EXPECTED TO JOIN—REPRISALS BEING PREPARED—CONGRESS AT LIMA HAS BILL FOR 300 PER CENT DUTY ON IMPORTS FROM HERE READY FOR PASSAGE

LIMA, May 12.—The leading republics of Latin America have begun diplomatic negotiations looking toward the formation of a Latin American customs union for united defense and concerted reprisals against the United States tariff policy, according to Foreign Minister Alberto Freundt Rosell to-day.

Mexico, Peru, Chile, and other republics have been exchanging views for some time. Peru and Chile have almost reached an agreement concerning the measures they will take together, and it is expected that Argentina and others will enter this agreement. He said:

"We are engaged in a frank, open struggle with the United States Congress," he explained. "Passage of the proposed duty on copper would mean absolute ruin to Peru and Chile. We have no alternative but to take concerted action in defense not only of our interests but of our very existence.

"The proposed duty on copper would cause the immediate closing of the Cerro de Pasco Co., throwing between 10,000 and 12,000 men out of work, followed by the paralyzation of the Central Railroad of Peru, isolating the interior from the capital and decreasing by 30 per cent Peru's customs revenues.

"We have instructed our ambassador in Washington to fight to the last ditch, have appealed to the Pan American Union in Washington for assistance, and are pushing diplomatic negotiations for a union of the Latin American republics to present a united front against the United States."

Argentina invited South American republics to form a customs union for defense against the United States several years ago, when Congress increased the duties on agricultural products. The negotiations failed largely because Peru and Chile were not interested at that time, as the increased tariffs did not affect metals. Peru and Chile are now taking the initiative and hope Argentina will join, because the reasons which impelled Argentina to take the initiative in the previous effort still exist.

A bill is pending in the Peruvian Congress for the levy of an import duty of 300 per cent on all imports from the United States. Action has been suspended pending the outcome of Peru's diplomatic efforts in Washington, but Doctor Freundt said the bill would be enacted and enforced if the copper duty is authorized, and intimated that Chile was preparing similar action as part of the agreement for common defense.

Peru's average annual imports from 1927 to 1930 totaled $144,000,000, of which 32 per cent came from the United States.

Doctor Freundt has invited South American diplomatic representatives to meet Monday afternoon to consider united action against communistic organizations.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, let us concede that Chile and Peru are wholly without justification for the action which they propose to take, assuming this article to speak the truth; let us assume that nothing that is proposed in this revenue act can afford any justification for such retaliatory action upon the part of either Chile or Peru; we must at any rate recognize the fact. It is obvious that our neighbors to the south of us on this hemisphere have so interpreted and are so interpreting the proposed tariff rates in this bill.

Now, let me read from a statement made by the Acting Secretary of State in the absence of the Secretary of State. I read this afternoon this statement from Mr. Castle, in a letter addressed to the Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP, Representative in Congress from my own district and acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, the letter being printed on the 17th of this month:

At the session of the Constituent Assembly (of Peru) of April 27, 1932, several congressmen spoke of the serious situation which would occur in Peru should the United States Government apply a duty on copper imported into the United States.

Mr. José Manuel Tirado stated that, should this measure be adopted, Peru should retaliate at once by increasing its customs duties on United States products, principally on merchandise made from cotton.

The Acting Secretary of State inclosed to the Ways and Means Committee extracts of the debate which occurred. I ask, Mr. President, that the extracts of the debate which the Acting Secretary inclosed, appearing on page 265 of the hearings, may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

At the session of the Constituent Assembly of April 27, 1932, several congressman spoke of the serious situation which would occur in Peru should the United States Government apply a duty on copper imported into the United States.

Mr. José Manuel Tirado stated that should this measure be adopted, Peru should retaliate at once by increasing its customs duties on United States' products, principally on merchandise made from cotton.

Congressman Domingo Sotil went further in his denunciation of the contemplated action of the United States Government in connection with the copper tax. He stated at this session, and also at the session of April 26, that the proposed duty on copper would spell death to the national mining industry, leaving 60,000 men without employment, thereby increasing misery in Peru. He added that the 2 cents per pound duty on lead closed the United States market to Peruvian lead; the low price for silver has virtually eliminated the local production of silver; the proposed duty on copper makes it indispensable to register the protest of Peru and to adopt rigorous retaliatory customs measures, and consequently Peru's reprisals should include an increase of 300 per cent ad valorem on articles brought in from the United States.

Congressman Armando Montes requested the Constituent Assembly to send notes to the Ministers of Finance and Foreign Affairs, to inform the Assembly of the measures that they have already taken in connection with this grave situation, and the policy that they contemplate following in order to counteract the crisis that is in the offing. That assembly sent the notes as requested. Doctor Montes gives a brief summary of the benefits which (a large American) copper company has provided for Peru and its economic development. He refers to the immediate and unprecedented crisis which will follow in Peru if the proposed import duty on copper is applied by the United States; he also shows how the closing down of the (copper) plant will * * * seriously affect government revenues; in short, it will affect directly a population of 90,000 and indirectly many others. Doctor Montes believes it to be urgent for the Foreign Office to take energetic steps to present a united front against the proposed copper duty on the part of Latin American countries which would be affected by the proposed duty. (Dispatch from American Embassy, Lima, dated April 29, 1932.)

The President of the Congress presented a resolution yesterday calling upon the Executive to confer with all Latin American countries which may be affected by the proposed American duties on copper and petroleum with a view to holding a Latin American conference for the purpose of suggesting identic retaliatory measures by the various countries affected should these duties be put into effect. * * * There is general resentment and even consternation here at the possibility of a 4-cent duty on copper for it would effectually ruin the largest mining unit in Peru, * * *, American-owned. (Telegram from American Embassy, Lima, dated May 11, 1932.)

Mr. GEORGE. I read only the memorandum submitted by the Acting Secretary:

The Chilean Government—

Going now to the Chilean Government—

1. The Chilean Government has noticed the action of a group made up of Senators and several governors of States of the Union in petitioning the President of the United States for the placing of an import duty on copper.

2. This action has caused serious anxiety in governmental and commercial circles in Chile on account of the crisis now affecting the entire world, and especially the economic life of Chile, the principal export products of which are in a condition of almost complete paralyzation.

3. Large sums of American capital are invested in the Chilean copper industry, and a duty on the importation of Chilean copper into the United States will affect such investments in equal degree with the economic life of Chile.

4. Attention is desired to be called to the above facts at this time in order that they may be at hand for reference when the question of a duty upon the imports of copper into the United States must be finally decided.

Appearing in this report of the hearings is a lengthy letter from Mr. Castle to the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to the same general tenor and effect.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to quote briefly from the Montreal Gazette of May 9, 1932, as I understand similar articles appeared throughout the Canadian press.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MAY DEMAND RETALIATORY TAX—WOULD ASK DUTY ON NICKEL AND ASBESTOS WHICH UNITED STATES MUST IMPORT

VICTORIA, May 8.—Possibility that British Columbia would seek retaliatory tariff measures if the United States imposed prohibitive duties on coal, copper, and lumber imports was seen here yesterday when Attorney General R. H. Pooley, acting Premier, intimated such a program was under consideration.

The proposed tariffs before the United States Congress include a $3 per 1,000 feet impost on lumber and duties on coal and copper, which would make export of these commodities from Canada to the United States almost impossible.

If these tariff increases go into effect, Acting Premier Pooley intimated, British Columbia would ask the Dominion Government to impose an export duty on nickel and asbestos—two commodities which the United States must import—and an import duty of $5 per ton on all coal entering Canada. In addition, the British Columbia government, acting within its own jurisdiction, would probably impose an individual inspection fee on all citrus fruits, apples, and vegetables imported into the Province.

Mr. Pooley said British Columbia has been a large importer of United States crude oil, fruits, and to some extent vegetables, while the country to the south imports its raw nickel and asbestos to a large extent from Canada.

Another commodity upon which recommendation may be made to Ottawa is crude petroleum, Canada imported, according to the 1930 figures, petroleum valued at $35,861,000 and gasoline worth $18,868,000.

Crude oil is the chief competitor of British Columbia coal in its home market. The suggestion has been advanced that, in the event of embargo being placed on Canadian coal, the Dominion apply a general tariff that would effectually shut out the United States product and enter into "favored nations" treaty arrangements with South American countries producing crude petroleum.

Premier S. F. Tolmie has gone to Ottawa and any representations necessary will be made through him direct to the Dominion Government with a request that action be taken by the Federal Parliament this present session.

From our State Department, under date of May 11, comes a copy of a telegram from our representative at Ottawa. I will not read it all, but the significant portion of it is this:

Order in council, May 9, authorizes the Minister of Mines, through the Dominion Fuel Board, to assist maritime coal to compete in Quebec and Ontario with imported coal by following subventions—

Thereafter enumerating a list of subsidies granted to Canadian coal in competition with imported coal, which, of course, will operate as effectively as a direct embargo upon American coal shipments into Canada. Yet we are told that all this is mere idle talk upon the part of other nations. We are warned that all this is a mere idle threat; that nothing will be done to our trade and commerce, in the face of the disastrous and retaliatory duties that have been imposed, quotas that have been imposed, and licensing systems that have been resorted to by other nations.

We can not criticize them. The only point is, Mr. President, that we seem to have forgotten that we do not have a monopoly upon tariff making in the United States. We seem to be in the attitude of the man who believes that he can lift himself out of this depression by his bootstraps; that we can live off our own fat, so to speak, and erect an embargo wall about our borders and keep out any article or commodity which competes in any way with anything produced in the United States.

Senators on this floor and men everywhere during this period when we have become tariff mad say, "What is the importance of 7 or 10 per cent of our foreign commerce? How does it compare in importance to the 90 per cent or the 93 per cent of the commerce and trade in the home market?"

No one would minimize the value of the home market. No one will for a moment minimize the importance of the market we have here for the great volume of our production, both raw and manufactured; but it is an unfortunate fact that all products and commodities are not so slightly dependent upon the foreign market. Let us consider this matter just for a moment. I wish the Senators representing and asking for these duties on this side, as well as those who proposed to vote with them on the other side, would approach the problem in an open-minded way just for a little while.

Six out of every 10 bales of our cotton, or 6 out of every 11 bales, at least, must be exported. More than 50 per cent of the products of the cotton farm must be exported and sold into the foreign market. There are more than 2,000,000 farm families engaged in raising cotton in the United States. Roughly, there are more than 10,000,000 Americans who are engaged directly in the production of cotton. Another 10,000,000, and even more, are directly dependent upon the cotton industry.

The only thing that the tariff can do for the cotton producer—the only thing it ever has done for the cotton producer—has been to increase the price of everything he must buy and use and to circumscribe and limit the purchasing power of every market in the world for his product. You say, "Does he not get the advantage of the home market?" Not at all. His cotton is sold in Liverpool, in Bombay, in any part of the earth, for precisely the same price at which it is sold at the mill in Carolina or in any port in the United States. The world price controls, freights and ocean-carriage charges alone being taken into account.

What has been the result? More than 20,000,000 cotton farmers—more than 20,000,000 American citizens—have had their purchasing power reduced and reduced again since 1920—reduced to the vanishing point. American manufacturers have lost their market with these 20,000,000 purchasers; and American manufacturers, despite the short-sighted view of partisanship, whether in my party or in the other, never will get back their market until the American farmer has had restored to him his purchasing power.

You say it is unfortunate that more than 2,000,000 of American farmers are raising cotton, a world commodity. Sixty per cent of each crop must be sold in the foreign market. "Let them go to something else." Let them go to what? Let them go to wheat, and the wheat farmers of Oklahoma and of all the Western wheat-growing States will have their problems multiplied. Drive them out of cotton production, and you drive them into the army of the unemployed, or you drive them into competition with other agricultural producers.

It is no answer to the plea of these people that the tariff has never done but two things to them: Run up the price of what they must buy and cripple and destroy the market into which they must sell their raw products. And you think I will be deterred from standing here on this floor by the charge of partisanship, when I raise my voice in behalf of more than 20,000,000 of my people, in order that oil may have a tariff and that lumber may have a tariff and that copper may have a tariff, and that even coal may have a tariff?

Coming again to the coal question, with Canada already taking steps to impose a $5 duty upon our coal as soon as this bill which imposes a $2 duty upon Canadian imports into the United States goes into effect, let me cite some of the facts. I do not hope to convince any man who is intent upon getting a special privilege for an industry without regard to how it affects the common welfare of the American people; but what are the facts?

Hard coal exported by the United States to Canada in 1929 was 3,376,000 tons, or 99.2 per cent of all of our exports of hard coal. In 1930 it was 2,532,000 tons, or 99.2 per cent of all of our exports. In 1931 our exports to Canada amounted to 99.7 per cent of our exports of hard coal, and to some less tonnage, but still a considerable tonnage.

Our exports of soft coal to Canada in 1929 amounted to 14,645,000 tons, or 84 per cent of our exports of soft coal. In 1930 they amounted to 13,000,000 tons plus, or 85.7 per cent of our exports of soft coal. In 1931 they amounted to 10,631,000 tons, or 87.7 per cent of our exports of soft coal in that year.

The exports of coke to Canada run approximately in the same general figures.

Now, I invite attention to the imports into the United States of hard coal and of soft coal.

Imports of hard coal into the United States for the year 1930 from the United Kingdom were 411,000 tons. Soft coal is not given. Perhaps there was no importation from the United Kingdom. I am not sure.

Canada: Hard-coal imports, 6,000 tons; soft coal, 180,000 tons. While Canadian exports generally of hard coal amounted to 2,532,000 tons, only 6,000 tons came into the United States, and while Canadian exports of soft coal generally amounted to 13,603,000 tons, only 180,000 tons came into the United States.

Mr. President, roughly speaking, we export to Canada about 16 tons of coal to every 1 ton of both hard and soft coal imported from Canada; and yet here is the unmistakable evidence that the Canadian Government proposes a duty of $5 a ton on the 16 tons imported from the United States in retaliation for the $2 per ton that we propose to impose upon the 1 ton imported from Canada.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there not a tariff of 75 cents a ton now on American coal going into Canada?

Mr. GEORGE. I think there is a tariff, placed in the last act.

Mr. DAVIS. And, if I remember correctly, the Canadian Government now is giving a subvention of 20 cents a ton to its coal-producing people.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. DAVIS. And the Canadian Government is granting three-eighths of a cent a mile on freight rates to encourage the coal operators in the western end to bring the coal on to the eastern market and to encourage the eastern coal to come to the central Canadian market.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right; and before he came in I read a cablegram, a copy of which has been furnished by our State Department, in which attention is called to the fact that the order in council to which the Senator refers has been abrogated and higher subventions already ordered since the House sent over this bill carrying a duty on coal.

Mr. DAVIS. Are they not doing that more because of the high cost of production of coal in the Nova Scotia mines? We can produce coal for from about $1.10 to $1.80, and in the Nova Scotia mines it costs $4 a ton to get it to the tipple for transportation.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I read the statement of the British Columbia premier in which he definitely suggested an import duty of $5 per ton on all coal entering Canada and other duties upon other American products.

Mr. DAVIS. All coal from the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. From the United States; yes. And he does not put it upon a cost basis; he puts it squarely where it belongs, upon the fear, at least, that we are about to exclude Canada from our own markets.

Mr. DAVIS. My understanding is that the subvention is granted for the purpose of saving whole communities in Canada because of the high cost of production of coal. In other words, if Canada does not give the market of its own coal to its own people it means the wiping out of certain coal communities in Nova Scotia.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator's understanding may be correct, but I do not care to repeat what I have read at length from the acting Premier. He points to the proposed duties and makes his recommendations for increased rates.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Was any effort made before the Finance Committee to establish that the proposed tax on coal equalizes the difference in the costs of production of coal in the United States and in Canada?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I will say to the Senator from Colorado that no effort was made during my presence in the Finance Committee to that end, and I have not had my attention called to any such effort.

Mr. President, wholly aside from the question of whether or not the duties which we propose are justified, wholly aside from the question as to whether or not those duties are fair or just, waiving all those questions aside, I think it must be accepted by fair-minded men that our tariff policy is at this moment operating as the tariff act of 1930 operated, as a danger signal, as a fire bell in the night. Indeed, Mr. President, to change the figure, it is not too much to say that, in so far as we can do so, we are about to deliver a body blow to our international trade and commerce, for this reason. We are now giving offense to our neighbor to the north of us in an acute fashion. We are giving offense to our neighbors to the south of us with respect to matters in which they have a vital interest. We are now reoffending, within the short space of two years, our neighbors upon this hemisphere. We are alienating the good opinion and good will of our neighboring States.

Can we do that with impunity? Can we continue the policy? What is the justification? What is the reason or the logic? Is it not time, when men want duties upon anything, that they address themselves to the manner in which the general welfare of the country is to be affected by those duties? We have lost sight of that. We have adopted the formula—"the difference between the cost of production in the United States and in the foreign countries." We are holding to the letter of the law. We are trampling under foot the whole spirit of tariff legislation. Ever the letter killeth. The spirit alone giveth life.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I state to the eloquent Senator from Georgia that one of the just complaints against the practical application of the so-called flexible provisions in the tariff law is that we are not even adhering to the letter of the law?

Mr. GEORGE. The distinguished Senator is quite right, and he has voiced that opinion in the Finance Committee and elsewhere with great force.

Every industry in the United States now believes that it has justified a tariff when it can come to the Congress and show to the Congress that the cost of producing is greater here than is the cost in some foreign producing country, utterly ignoring the broader, wider question of how the destiny of the American people is to be affected by it.

Can you not see that when everybody has been granted special privileges, we will be just where we started? Can you not see that you have condemned to economic servitude or slavery 20,000,000 American people who are engaged in raising cotton, who can not receive, who never have received, a single penny out of tariff rates, but who have borne the burden of the tariff system in the double fashion that I have already indicated?

Can you not be reasonable? Can you not say, "Even though we believe in protection, we recognize the right of other Americans to live, and recognize the right of other citizens to at least have bread and meat?"

In the face of this the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] thinks that he will deter me by the charge that I have injected a partisan note into this debate. I am justified if I put it upon the narrow ground that I would defeat the whole tax bill before you shall pile this additional burden upon a people already overburdened. But I do not do that. I merely attempt to direct my appeal to the sense of justice and reason of my fellow Senators in this body.

If there ever was a righteous cause, if there ever was a time when a band of Senators might stand here and say—and might be assured that ultimately public opinion would justify them—"You can have your tax bill, and we will help you get it, but you must choose between the tax bill and these protective duties you wish to place upon our people," this is the time, when you have been reducing year by year the purchasing power of more than 2,000,000 American families engaged in growing cotton, reducing it year by year and in a definite measure by tariffs, until the purchasing power of those producers virtually disappeared from the picture, and an equal number of people directly dependent upon the cotton-producing population in the small villages and towns of the South.

Now you propose to put a tax upon lubricating oil, to put a tax upon fuel oil, and to put a tax upon gasoline. You do not stop there. You propose to put a tax of $2 per short ton upon the asphalt which paves the highways and streets of those same cotton farmers, as well as all other citizens of the United States, because the oil industry is sick, because the copper industry is sick; and it may well be admitted that they are sick, but they will be far sicker if the visionless program of raising tariffs every time an industry finds itself in difficulty is pursued.

It is said we must maintain the standard of labor. Anyone who will read the debates when the tariff policy was originally proposed will find that the tariff came not to raise wages in the United States but it came because the wages were too high, at that time, at least, to permit the growth of industry, and therefore industry had to be given some advantage. Let it have a fair advantage where it needs it. But let the advantage be reasonable; let the protective duty given be reasonable and just, fairly adjusted to those who can not come within the circle of the protected industries.

Can not that be done? Assuredly it can be done. It should be done now if we were not so obsessed with the idea that we must remedy all unhappy conditions, which in one moment we are told are due to world conditions, by increased tariffs. The next moment we are reminded that our tariffs alone are responsible for whatever degree of prosperity we have in the United States.

Let us suppose that the oil industry is sick. I have studied the oil question, I have given it fair and careful study. The oil people have made out an overwhelming case of monopoly upon the part of certain producers, a monopoly which ought to be prosecuted. Yet the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], a Senator whom I admire greatly, who certainly is not unfriendly to one of these giant monopolies, voted for this tariff duty in the Committee on Finance.

Be advised that when you have written your tariff it will be the instrument with which these great companies will literally sever your bodies from your souls. If they have a monopoly, as the oil people have persuaded me they have, be advised that this tariff will not rob them of that monopoly, and be advised that the monopolist can use your instrumentality more directly and effectively against you than you will ever be able to use it against him.

As for copper, the copper people—and I must say it in candor—seemed to me to make out a better case for tariff protection than any other one of these particular applicants who have besought the aid of the Finance Committee and who now beseech the aid of the Senate. I do not think that a tariff will be very greatly helpful to the copper industry, but it does seem to me that its case is stronger upon the facts.

As for the coal industry, the tariff will be of no help whatsoever, except possibly to one or two or at most a few producers in the State of Pennsylvania who sell their coal on the New England coast. I may even be wrong about that.

As for lumber, my own people still have the remnants of once magnificent forests. They have depleted those forests, destroyed those natural resources, in the hope that they might overcome in some measure the frightful handicap that a tariff-mad country has been pleased to put upon them in the name of patriotism and common good. I have sympathy for them; surely I have.

I have sympathy for the copper producers. There is a copper mine in the northwest corner of my own State. I know the industry is suffering. I have sympathy for the oil producers, though my State has no oil. I know that they are suffering, especially the independent producers. I have no doubt that the corresponding loss of the large producers of petroleum products has likewise been great, maybe as great in point of percentages as the losses of the small producer. I have no doubt that the coal people are in distress—I know that they are. I shall be glad to help them.

But not a single advocate of these rates, not one, has stood on this floor and said that these rates would promote the general welfare of the people of the United States. Not a single voice has been raised on this floor, even in assertion that the benefits derived from the duty would outweigh the burdens placed by the tariff, if granted, upon all the people of the United States. That is the test and the only fair test of whether a tariff should be granted upon any product at any time. It is not whether it costs me more to make my cotton or whether it costs me more to manufacture lumber, or whatnot, than some competitor in some foreign country. It is whether or not, if I am given a special favor, and that is what it is, if I am given the special protection of the Government, that nevertheless the contribution to the general welfare, though the direct benefit flows to me, will outweigh the general loss to the whole people. Upon that basis tariffs have been and may again be justified.

But look for a moment into that same section of the country where these 20,000,000 cotton farmers live. I invite any man to rise now and say how in any respect a producer of raw cotton has been benefited by the tariff. He has borne two direct burdens which I have pointed out and which all men know. But in the same territory where these cotton farmers live, we have cities upon the seaboard. God gave them the advantages and imposed upon them the disadvantages of water-front life. These cities have no water power. These cities must depend upon fuel oil to light their streets and to light their homes and to furnish the motive power for all of the industries within their borders. Have I not the right to say that this additional burden ought not to be imposed in order to give a special grant to oil producers? Whatever degree of suffering they may be now enduring, it is not comparable to the suffering which the cotton farmers have endured since 1920. Why, I ask, is it not proper for me or for any other Senator to ask the Senate and to ask the country to weigh the advantage to the whole people and to weigh the corresponding cost or disadvantage to the people of the United States when Senators are asked to vote these duties upon these necessities of life?

I know that some of the oil-producing States likewise produce cotton. They are fortunate in having a variety of products. They are, of course, to be congratulated because of the diversity of products within their borders. But is that any reason why any man should forget the great burden that we are asked to place upon a large population that has neither oil nor copper nor coal nor any other important product that can be effectively protected? A great population must go on raising cotton for the time being at any rate or march out into the army of the unemployed or go into competition with the wheat growers or become competitors of the dairying interests of the Northwest. Is there any line of industry that can absorb 5,000,000 cotton growers at this hour? Is there any agricultural pursuit that can welcome 5,000,000 additional producers within its ranks? If not, we have a right to invite Senators to consider these things before voting these duties.

Mr. President, the truth is that interests in this country want the law to extend the arm with the itching palm further into the depleted pockets of a despoiled and outraged people, indifferent to what may be done to one-sixth of our people, if only they can have what they want. Some of your constituents are my constituents, and they have appealed to me. They have addressed very definite requests, not to say commands in some instances, that I shall support some of these duties.

I appreciate their distress, but I can not comply because I know, as the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] said, that it is proposed to tax 999 farmers for the benefit of 1 farmer when you impose the oil and other duties that are contained in the bill. I have heard no finer expression of common sense since I became a Member of the Senate than the speech of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] in opposition to these tariff duties a little more than two hours ago. He believes in protection.

But that is not the question. The question is whether we will now continue the policy which has contributed to our present unhappy condition and had its influence upon like action in other countries of the world.

I do not know how long it may be before we learn it, but we must learn that we have not a monopoly of tariff making, that we can not offend the countries which lie to the south of us and north of us in this hemisphere and give offense to all European countries with whom we have been accustomed to trade and yet hope for the prosperity that we all long to see return in the United States. I do not know how long before we will learn it, but until we learn it there will be no general recovery. We may resort to artificial means; but until the purchasing power of large groups of our fellow citizens in agriculture has been at least partially restored, American manufacturers will not find their own home market restored to them.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. I wish to close with the statement that if we are to continue this policy this revenue bill with every item retained in it will not balance the Budget. The Budget can not be balanced by any taxing provision now in the bill if we do not give American business an opportunity to come back; and if it is going to be strangled and stifled, the Budget will remain unbalanced. Again, if every tariff item in this bill, in whatever degree, may be justified upon the facts, Senators ought not to insist upon writing them in the bill when it has become unquestionably true that some of us at least feel that we are justified in standing here and making a fight against the inclusion of those items in the bill, though we are ready to vote for every reasonable revenue item in the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-night it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before that is agreed to I should like to ask the Senator at what time he expects to move a recess to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. At 10 o'clock, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that when the Senate completes its business to-night it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. Inasmuch as the opponents of the oil tariff have consumed most of the day, and I am sure have made most of the long speeches they will want to make, I ask unanimous consent that speeches hereafter be limited to 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the opposition to the pending amendment has been so ably presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and other Senators who have preceded me that it is unnecessary for me to do more than to summarize the arguments against the levying of the tariff duty on oil.

The first objection that is presented by the opponents of this proposed duty is that a revenue bill is not a proper measure in which to incorporate protective-tariff duties; that the revenues which would be derived from the duty, if imposed, would be inconsequential; that the proposal is a protective or embargo tariff and should not be incorporated or considered in connection with a purely internal revenue bill.

The next objection relates to the merits of the question itself: Has there been presented here a case for the levying of a protective-tariff duty? I conceive that all will agree that when a petition is presented for the imposition of a protective-tariff duty, which means increased prices to the consumers, the petitioner should at least be able to answer in the affirmative two questions. The first question is, Is the industry seeking protection depressed? The second question is, Is the industry depressed because of the importations of an article or commodity comparable to the domestic article and in competition with it?

As to the first question, is the industry depressed? I concede that each and every one of the four industries affected by tariff items in this bill is depressed. The oil industry is depressed; the lumber industry is depressed; the coal industry is depressed; and the copper industry is depressed—indeed, they are all desperately depressed. Suffering and unemployment must accompany any description of the condition of these industries at the present time. But, Mr. President, I assert that every single industry in this country can present the same picture of depression and can advance the same argument; it is merely necessary to substitute the name of some industry or commodity other than oil, lumber, coal, or copper. The conditions in the industrial life of this country are deplorable; unemployment, suffering, and bankruptcy stalk in and out of every business activity. There is no exception. The conditions described in connection with the industries for the products of which tariff duties are sought could, I repeat, be very appropriately applied to every other industry.

But I come to a more important and essential question. Can the depression in these industries be attributed to or be connected with the importation of similar commodities from abroad? All will agree that tariff protection levied where there are no importations and where competition in domestic markets exists is useless and empty. In order, therefore, to make a prima facie case for a protective tariff it is essential to show that importations are depressing the industry, reducing the opportunity of the domestic industry to control the home market; aye, and even more, it is essential to show that those importations are increasing in volume.

Mr. President, what is the startling fact when we come to examine the question of whether the imports into this country of these particular commodities are affecting and injuring the domestic producer? Let us examine the facts.

Take the year 1931—not at all a favorable year for the consideration of business conditions and for measuring domestic production with importations, a year when it is admitted that there was general and widespread depression throughout the world. The facts show that the net balance of exports over imports in the case of these four commodities was all in favor of the domestic production and the domestic industry.

The net balance of exports over imports of petroleum and its products was $177,758,000. Of coal, the net balance of exports over imports was $54,984,000. The net balance of exports over imports of lumber, rough and planed, was $29,830,000. The net balance of exports over imports of copper was $6,003,000, and of coke, $3,494,000.

Do these figures indicate that the petitioners have produced the very essential evidence that is necessary before levying upon 120,000,000 of people a tax upon these products?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. LONG. I was just wondering if the State of Massachusetts is interested in the wool tariff.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. What is that tariff?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator mean the tariff on raw wool?

Mr. LONG. On manufactured wool.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The tariff on raw wool is 31 cents a pound.

Mr. LONG. What is it on manufactured wool?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It varies, depending upon the character and type of the manufactured article.

Mr. LONG. There are about 120,000,000 people using that wool, are there not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. Has it ever occurred to the Senator that he might be solicitous of the 120,000,000 people wearing wool, and stop them from having to pay this terrible tax?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Unquestionably I would be solicitous. I have opposed increasing the tariff on raw wool and also thereby increasing the duty on wool manufactures.

Mr. LONG. The Senator would like to reduce that wool tariff, would he not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the facts justified it, I would.

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows the facts and I do not. Does the Senator think he ought to have no tariff on wool, as we have on oil?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No, sir; I never have advocated that.

Mr. LONG. It is just a case of whose ox is gored in this matter?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator can put whatever construction he wishes upon it. I am not now discussing the advisability or the inadvisability of a tariff on wool; but I am willing to meet the question of a tariff on wool or on manufactured wools upon the basis or tests I have laid down.

I have been in the Senate 10 years, and I defy any Senator to say when and where I have voted for tariff duties that did not involve proof that the domestic industry was suffering by reason of importations. I stood upon this floor in the last tariff debate and advocated a tariff duty on hats, none of which are produced in my State, because the overwhelming evidence before my committee was that the hat industry was being wiped out by a flood of imports from abroad. I do say, however, that there is no justification and no proof justifying the levying of a protective tariff duty unless it appears that the domestic industry is depressed by reason of the home market being restricted or curbed because of importations from abroad.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was the Senator referring to wool hats or straw hats when he referred to hats?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not recall at this moment, to be frank with the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Both kinds.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps both kinds. I do recall, though, only very recently reading over the speech that I made, and I have it in my desk here, in which I differed from my colleagues; and in fact on two or three occasions I pointed out that I thought there was a case where the imports were increasing so strikingly, and the domestic industry was depressed thereby to such an extent, that tariff protection should be granted.

Mr. BARKLEY. My inquiry was not prompted by a desire to get into any controversy about it, but merely to state that if the Senator referred to straw hats, the bill which at that time was under consideration, and which included a tariff on straw hats, put the tariff on them so high that even the present President of the United States has reduced that tax by Executive order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am using the illustration simply for the purpose of developing the question as to whether or not it is an important item and factor to consider, in the question of a protective-tariff duty, whether or not there are increasing imports. I concede, and I take it to be the position of the Democratic Party, that we are willing to protect the domestic industry against ruthless competition from abroad that results in depriving the domestic industry of the opportunity of a fair chance of growth and development, and of selling its product in the home market.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILL. The figures that the Senator has given relate to the year 1931.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. DILL. The Senator has not given the figures, nor has he given us the results of the depreciated currencies that are so effective in favor of our imports and as against our exports in comparison with 1931. I wonder if the Senator has those figures.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that I have not those figures, but I have the statement made only yesterday by the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission before the Ways and Means Committee when he said that there was no justification for increasing tariff duties because of the depreciation in foreign currency.

Mr. DILL. No; because he said he wanted a general raise of tariffs all along the line instead.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Was he not there in opposition to the Hawley bill?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and he said that he wanted a general raise of tariffs all along the line, instead.

I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that a depreciated currency operates in two ways. It operates as a tariff against our products going into a foreign country in competition with the products of that country, and it operates as destructive of our tariff for the goods that come into this country from that country, and it has only been operative, really, in the last few months.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Did I understand the Senator from Washington to say that the chairman of the so-called nonpartisan Tariff Commission appeared before the Ways and Means Committee to advocate a general increase in tariffs?

Mr. DILL. I do not know whether he is the chairman. I think his name is O'Brien.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. O'Brien is the chairman; yes.

Mr. DILL. He is quoted in the newspapers to-day as having said that he was opposed to a tariff equal to the depreciation in currency, but that he favored rather a general raising of tariffs all along the line.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator know whether he was called before the committee or whether he appeared voluntarily?

Mr. DILL. I am unable to answer as to that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me? I promise not to disturb him again.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly, sir; I shall be happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I want to ask just a couple or three questions, and then I will not disturb the Senator again.

The Senator from Massachusetts was in the Senate when the last tariff bill was passed, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. May I inquire of the Senator whether he voted for that tariff bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am proud to say that I have never voted in favor of a tariff bill since I have been in the Senate. I vigorously opposed the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator vote for any of the items in the tariff bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. Did he vote for the tariff on saddlery and harness; does the Senator remember?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not remember, sir.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator remember having voted for the tariff on wrapper tobacco in a trade-out with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who wanted a tariff on long-staple cotton, whereby there was a swap movement made in the caucus?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am unable to say how I voted on any particular item. I voted on each according to my convictions as to whether or not the facts presented justified increasing or lowering the duty. I know one thing, I never traded my vote on any tariff or other measure in this body.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator gave some figures on copper a moment ago and I should like to get those figures. I understood him to say that the export of copper was greater than the import. Would the Senator mind giving the figures?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The amount is $6,003,000.

Mr. WHEELER. More exported than imported?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Would the Senator mind telling me where he got those figures?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I got them in connection with the preparation of the minority report, and I incorporated them in the minority report. They came from the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I think his figures are in error; but first let me call his attention to this fact:

I have here before me the sworn statement given out by the Anaconda Copper Co., showing that the cost of production of copper in the city of Butte in their mines is 13.2 cents per pound, whereas copper can be brought into this country from Africa and laid down in New Jersey for 5 cents. Likewise, it can be brought in from Chile and laid down here for somewhere around 5 or 6 cents. Likewise, it can be brought in from Canada and laid down; and while I concede the Senator's statement that in 1929 the production of copper in this country exceeded the consumption, I think the Senator's figures are in error as to the present time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should be very glad to have the Senator correct them. I know the Senator has appreciated the purpose I am using them for, as indicating, even if they are slightly inaccurate, the importance of showing, in order to establish a claim for a protective-tariff duty, that the imports are larger than the exports, and that the imports are of such a volume as seriously to curtail domestic production.

Mr. WHEELER. I have not the figures on oil; but I do know with reference to copper that there is no question in the world that the facts can be and will be presented to the Senate showing that there is not a mining company in the United States of America producing copper that can compete with the slave labor of Africa, or with the cheap labor of Mexico, or with the cheap labor of Chile; and the sworn figures of the Anaconda Copper Co.—who, incidentally, are not in favor of a tariff because of the fact that they own mines outside of the United States—show that in 1931 their cost was 13.2 cents per pound.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have given some figures indicating that the exports of these four commodities in the year 1931 were in each case in excess of the imports. Now, I am going to give some figures combining all of these products together and present to the consideration of the Senate what we are undertaking to do with our foreign export business if we adopt these tariff provisions.

Mr. President, 18½ per cent of our entire export business consists of purchases by the people of foreign countries of oil, copper, coal, and lumber—18½ per cent of our entire foreign business. In 1931 we imported $175,000,000 worth of these products, and in the same year we exported $440,000,000 worth of these products.

We are, therefore, attempting the impossible task of trying to retain an export business of $440,000,000 by the elimination of an import business of $175,000,000.

Mr. President, the proponents of these tariff duties seek to put an embargo on all imports of these products and yet retain $440,000,000 worth of business which they have enjoyed through the exportation of these products to foreign countries.

Was there ever a more unsound case presented for tariff duties than in the case of these four products? I repeat, they should prove at the outset that the importation of a particular product is destroying the domestic market for the domestic producer, and they can produce no evidence here of that most necessary fact in order to exact a heavy toll in increased prices from the American consumers.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator bases that argument on the assumption that the countries to which these products are exported are the countries from which the products are imported.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Oh, I do not mean to have that inference drawn. It does not follow at all.

Mr. DILL. That would be the effect of the Senator's argument. But I want to call the Senator's attention to this fact, that as a result of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill this country started a tariff war throughout the world, and retaliatory tariffs have been built up all over the world against the products of this country. The products covered in this bill are left out of the Hawley-Smoot bill, and the producers of them are suffering from the retaliatory tariffs of other countries against the products of the same communities which produce these products.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I note the Senator's observation.

Mr. President, having presented what seem to me to be the general arguments against the imposition of tariff duties upon these four commodities, I want to direct Senators' attention to the case under immediate consideration, namely, that of oil.

First, I want to call attention to the volume of the imports. Then I want to call attention to the difference in the cost of imported oil in comparison with that of domestic oil. Third, I want to call attention to what benefit, if any, the domestic producer can expect to enjoy if this tariff duty is levied. Fourth, the effect of the tariff upon (1) manufacturing industries; (2) home owners; (3) farmers; (4) automobile owners; and (5) the American merchant marine.

Mr. President, 120,000,000 barrels of imported oil are used annually in the eastern part of the United States. It is transported there by water. Twenty million barrels are consumed in New England, one-sixth of the total amount. Twelve million of the 20,000,000 barrels are consumed in Massachusetts. Three manufacturing concerns alone in Massachusetts consume annually 2,000,000 barrels of oil. So much for the consumption. We all know of the exceedingly large volume of the domestic production. It amounted in 1931 to 850,261,000 barrels of crude oil.

Let me now call attention to the price of the imported oil carried by water to the Atlantic seaboard, in comparison with the price of the domestic oil carried by rail to the Atlantic seaboard.

Oil can be delivered, and is delivered, at 79 to 89 cents a barrel when imported and transported by water along the Atlantic seacoast. It costs approximately $1.90 per barrel to produce and transport oil by rail from the mid-continent field to the Atlantic seaboard.

That is why the advocates of the oil tariff urged and requested originally a duty of $1 per barrel, in order to offset the difference in the price of the imported oil transported by water as against the domestic oil transported by rail to the Atlantic seacoast.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, can the Senator tell us what part of that charge is a freight charge?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator means on the domestic oil?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will give the figure.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is about 76 cents.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The freight charge from the mid-continent field to the Atlantic seaboard is about 76 cents. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for reminding me of that. I was going to say approximately 80 cents.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It would appear that this is a problem of freight rates rather than of tariffs, then.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. What is the proposition here? Let us figure out that difference. Oil costs 79 to 89 cents, let us say 90 cents, when delivered to the Atlantic seaboard from the foreign field. It costs $1.90 when brought from the domestic field to the Atlantic seaboard, so that there is a difference of a dollar.

What is the proposition here? It is to impose a tariff duty of 21 cents per barrel, not a gallon, but 21 cents a barrel. What are my New England consumers going to do? Are they going to stop buying imported oil, refuse to add 21 cents to the present price, and buy from the domestic producers? Not at all, for that would mean 80 cents more per barrel than the imported price plus the tariff duty of 21 cents.

The Senator from Minnesota appreciates the point I am about to make, namely, that this tariff duty can not and will not be of any benefit to the domestic producer. It should be a dollar a barrel to be of any benefit to him. The proposed duty is only 21 cents a barrel. The difference needed is admittedly $1 a barrel. We have the situation here of Senators proposing a tariff duty which will not help the domestic producer in obtaining any advantage for him on the Atlantic seaboard market, but will raise the price of oil to the industries, to the users of oil for fuel, to the automobile users, and to the consumers in that section who use gasoline.

Let me emphasize that. I repeat, it can not and will not result in the delivery of the Atlantic-seaboard oil market to the proponents of this tariff. It may have the result of increasing the price 21 cents a barrel; to whom? To the Atlantic-seaboard purchaser. But they are still going to have their oil imported. It may have the advantage of increasing the price of oil to the consumers in the immediate field and in the immediate sphere of the oil-producing fields. But that is a very doubtful proposition.

Mr. President, I now come to the effect that this duty of 21 cents a barrel would have in increasing the production costs of the industries of the Atlantic seaboard, and increasing the fuel costs of the home owners who use oil for heating purposes, and increasing the expenses of automobile users.

First as to industry. I refer to that rate fixed by the House, the 42 cents per barrel, or what is equivalent to 42 cents per barrel. I choose for the purpose of illustration a few plants located in the southeastern section of Massachusetts.

It is estimated that the tax levied in the House would increase the cost of operating the municipal lighting plant at Taunton, Mass., $40,000 a year. That is the information the mayor of that city gives me. Taunton is a manufacturing city of about 50,000 inhabitants. It is one of the few cities that owns its own municipal lighting plant, and the mayor of that city estimates that if the rate is made, as in the House bill, 42 cents—and, of course, cost under the rate in the Senate committee bill would be one-half—it will cost $40,000 a year additional to purchase the oil necessary for the running of the municipal lighting plant.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the mayor give the total annual cost of purchasing fuel oil for the lighting plant of that city?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have a letter from the mayor, which I will be glad to show the Senator, in which he presents his case. He has written me giving these figures.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was just interested to know how he arrives at the estimate of $40,000 as the amount of increased cost, because that would have to be represented in the increased price of oil.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Where constituents who have written me suggesting what the increased price would be to them, I have not attempted to analyze their statements, I have not attempted to say, "I think you are mistaken; let me have your proofs." I am attempting to quote what they have written me, and I am going to quote other figures besides those as to the municipal lighting plant at Taunton. It seems to me that the increased price of $40,000 for oil used by the municipal lighting plant at Taunton, based on the rate in the bill as it passed the House, is not excessive.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the population of Taunton?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. About 50,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not mean by my question to intimate that the mayor is incorrect about it, but it struck me that that was rather a large increase.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have several other increases to cite.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would, of course, carry with it the implication that if the price of crude oil in the United States increased 42 cents a barrel by natural processes, the increase in the operation of that plant would be higher.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is a plant in my State which uses 700,000 barrels, and an increase of 21 cents a barrel, the Senator can figure out, would mean about $140,000, approximately, if it should become effective.

Mr. President, the increased cost to the Whitington Manufacturing Co., of Taunton, would be $30,000 a year. That is based on the House rate. Of course under the Senate rate it would be one-half that.

The increase to the American Printing Co., of Fall River, would be $157,000 a year, under the House rate.

The increase to the Sales Finishing Co., of Pawtucket, R. I., would be $125,000 a year.

One mill at Lawrence, Mass., estimates the increased burden to them—one mill alone, I call to the attention of the Senator from Kentucky—at $200,000 a year, based, again, upon the House rate of 1 cent a gallon.

Of course, all of these figures will be reduced one-half if the rate in the Senate committee bill is adopted. In a word, the total burden to New England consumers in industry is estimated at $100,000,000.

Mr. President, in order that the Senate may appreciate the importance of the oil duty to New England, I want to call attention to the percentage that oil represents in the total imports to four of the leading New England ports of entry. Oil represented 13 per cent of the total imports into the port of Portland, Me., in the year 1930. Oil represented 26 per cent of the total imports into the port of Boston in 1930. Oil represented 99.9 per cent of the total imports into the city of Fall River in 1930—Fall River being, as we all know, a very extensive textile manufacturing city. It is on the water front, and the large industries there are able to have oil transported by water right to their very doors. Oil represented 71 per cent of the total imports into the port of Providence, R. I.

Mr. President, I shall conclude directly, but before doing so I want to call attention to the effect this duty will have on the home owner. It is estimated now that there are 100,000 home owners in Massachusetts alone who are using oil for heating purposes in their homes. It is estimated that it would mean an average increased cost of $27 per family if the rate in the bill as it passed the House is adopted, which may be adopted in conference, or an annual increased cost in their fuel of $13.50 if the rate in the Finance Committee bill is adopted. In other words, 100,000 home owners are to be penalized with increased burdens in this period of depression with no corresponding benefit to the producers of domestic oil, because they will have to continue to get their oil transported by water from the foreign fields unless the duty is made very much higher than that levied in the bill; and if it is levied at $1 a barrel, we might as well conclude that New England has joined Arizona in becoming dotted with ghost towns and ghost cities.

I hope the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] will pardon my use of his very vivid and dramatic illustration of the effect that the closing down of the copper mines has had in Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield gladly to my friend.

Mr. ASHURST. I had no intention of interrupting the brilliant and able Senator from Massachusetts. He has evidenced that he is a master of his views of the subject. But able as is the Senator and notwithstanding the cameolike distinctness with which he has brought out his own points as he sees them, I observe that it was not a protective tariff but free trade that made ghost towns of the copper-mining camps and made the copper-smelter stacks to stand now like hearse plumes.

Some years ago Arizona was signally honored during a political campaign when the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], whose eloquence in campaigns is eagerly sought, came to Arizona and delivered a speech which, after the lapse of nearly 10 years, is affectionately remembered by the citizens of the community in which he spoke. Somewhat adjacent to that community it was concluded that a new and commodious schoolhouse should be erected with lines of elegance and classic halls, and it was further determined that a copper roof would be appropriate for that schoolhouse so near that then thriving copper-producing region.

The school trustees assumed that American copper would be used, but, lo, after the roof had been capped upon the building it was discovered that the copper was from Chile! [Laughter.] Because, as I have said before, copper can be produced in those countries of convict, conscript, and forced and cheap labor, at a labor cost in some places of 8 cents a day and in some other places at 50 cents a day.

The American copper producers and copper miners can not compete and ought not with our American standards of living be required to compete with the convict, forced, and conscript labor of Russia and the cheap and forced and insensate labor of some parts of South America and Africa.

I have trespassed too long upon the time of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I thank him for affording me this opportunity to interrupt and, I fear, mar the symmetry of his speech.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator, in his brilliant description of my campaigning tour in Arizona, omitted to mention the fact that after he had led me through the State of Arizona, where he needed no pleader to urge the insignificant minority who remain indifferent to his fine record of public service, he finally brought me, before I left Arizona, to the town of Tombstone, to get the tombstones to vote for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask if that is why the Senator from Arizona referred a moment ago to the "cemetery" of the address of the Senator from Massachusetts? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly it had some association.

Mr. President, it is gratifying, notwithstanding my attitude of opposition to these duties, to appreciate that the other side of the question is being so ably championed by such brilliant, experienced, and astute public servants as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the Senators from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS and Mr. GORE], and others who are advocating these duties.

I want to conclude by inviting attention not only to the burdens which this protective duty on oil will bring to the industry and home owners but finally the burden which it will bring to the owners of automobiles. One of the Senators called my attention to the fact that there are 26,000,000 reputed owners of automobiles in this country. If this tax becomes effective on gasoline, it is going to mean a tremendous burden to these consumers—and all this for the benefit of a few big domestic producers.

Mr. President, we ought not to be advocating burdens and barriers at this period and epoch in the history of our country. Aside from the fact that these duties have no place in a purely internal revenue bill, they are going to result in bringing injury to our export business, no benefit to the domestic producer, and will be a further source of discouragement and disheartenment to American consumers.

Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD in connection with my remarks several letters and communications of protest that have come to me from my constituents in regard to this proposed duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EFFECT OF THE OIL TARIFF

First. Will yield Treasury no revenue; will subsidize great oil corporations approximately $500,000,000 at expense of consumers.
Second. Farmers' gasoline bills will be increased $95,000,000.
Third. The great corporations will collect the subsidy.
Fourth. The Atlantic seaboard affects price levels in the world trade.
Fifth. Party platforms against tariff on oil.
Sixth. An oil tariff will affect our foreign trade.
Seventh. Will affect road building throughout the country.
Eighth. Will result in the abandonment of our long-standing conservation policy.

MARITIME ASSOCIATION OF THE BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Boston, Mass., January 12, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It seems proper to bring to your attention the relative importance of oil imports as compared with other import commodities received at the principal New England ports. The following table shows in short tons the volume of foreign petroleum and petroleum products received at the ports of Portland, Boston, Fall River, and Providence during the years 1929 and 1930, and the percentage relationship of such oil imports to the total foreign imports received at each port named during the years 1929 and 1930:

Port	1929		1930
	Tons	Percentage of total imports	Tons	Percentage of total imports
Portland	75,544	10½	108,515	13
Boston	918,557	28	751,068	26
Fall River	807,757	99½	819,864	99.9
Providence	473,073	73	545,112	71

This shows how seriously any limitations or restrictions on foreign oil imports would affect the New England ports. The action taken by the members of the New England delegation in protesting any such legislation is heartily indorsed by the maritime and port interests of this section.

Respectfully yours,

F. S. DAVIS, Manager.

BRIEF OF OPPOSITION OF INDEPENDENT OIL MEN OF NEW ENGLAND TO S. J. RES. 238 AND S. 5818

1. Approximately 70 per cent of the fuel oil sold in New England at the present time comes from imports.

2. Approximately 70 per cent of all the fuel oil sold by independent marketers comes from imports.

3. Practically all of the gasoline sold by independents comes from imports.

4. The embargo on refined imports and the limitation on crude oils increase the cost to the independent of his product, and from the experience of the past the increase in retail price would not be proportionate with the increase in cost, with the result that the margin between cost and selling price would not be sufficient for independents to operate without a loss.

5. The price of fuel oil will be increased to such an extent that there will be a return to coal and subsequent harm to the independent oil men's business.

6. Limitation of crude imports and prohibition of refined imports will not be as effective in overcoming the conditions due to overproduction as proper curtailment of production with reference to the amount in storage and the demand.

7. The inability to obtain fuel oil and the inability to obtain gasoline at a price that will allow a sufficient margin of profit for continued operation by independents can only result in the abolition of the independent as a competitor. With this competition removed, the control of prices will be in the hands of one group, with the result of a substantial increased cost to the public, and the major American producing integrated companies will have accomplished legally the very thing that was sought to be avoided by the Clayton and Sherman Acts. It is estimated that it will result in an increase of 75 cents a barrel for fuel oil, which means an increase of $90,000,000 in the Atlantic seaboard States and an increase in cost of gasoline in Massachusetts alone of $4,000,000. No one can estimate the effect that the increase will have on New England manufacturers who are burning fuel oil, or whether it will result in driving some manufacturers back to the use of coal, with a tremendous expense for conversion, and neither is it possible to estimate the effect that an embargo would have in the nature of a retaliative tariff by the countries affected by the embargo on the products of New England manufacturers; but there can be no question that a retaliative tariff would mean a tremendous decrease in the number of sales orders now received by New England manufacturers in foreign countries, and thus through another medium a great addition to the already acute unemployment situation.

8. The relief that an embargo might give to workers in the mid-continent oil fields will be more than overcome by the number that will be put out of work that are now employed both in eastern refineries and by the independent marketers.

9. The embargo on imports will not cure the situation, because the amount of exports exceeds the amount of imports by more than 50,000,000 barrels.

10. The practical effect of the embargo on independents in New England will be to limit the sources of supply for gasoline to two sources, both of which at the present time import a part of their products. It should, moreover, be borne in mind that an embargo of this nature establishes an extremely dangerous precedent and that if it is effected demands for embargoes on other commodities are sure to follow. At the present time there is agitation in Michigan for the obtaining of an embargo on copper if the embargo on oil is successful in the Senate.

THE OIL-DUTY SITUATION

For two years the mid-continental and California oil producers have been attempting to get an embargo or a heavy duty on foreign oil, which comes principally from Mexico and Venezuela. Bills of various kinds are now pending before Congress. They may be grouped as follows:

(1) Bills calling for an embargo on importations of foreign oil.

(2) Bills imposing a duty of $1 a barrel on crude and fuel oil and 50 per cent ad valorem on refined oils.

(3) Bills giving the Tariff Commission jurisdiction over articles on the free list as well as over articles on the dutiable list.

These bills have the strongest kind of backing from the independent oil producers and from some of the large companies, such as the Sinclair Co.

The situation so far as New England is concerned is as follows:

New England consumes 20,000,000 barrels of fuel oil a year. The price of this oil at the present time at the tanks is 60 cents a barrel. The Tariff Commission in a special report has found that it costs approximately $1.90 a barrel to land oil from the mid-continental fields in New England. It would seem as if the price of fuel oil would go up $1 a barrel. It is demonstrated that an increase of $1 a barrel on crude oil would mean an increase of 4 cents a gallon on gasoline.

Another angle of the situation is the increase in cost of asphalt. Foreign oil has an asphalt base. Mid-continental oil has not. All asphalt must come either from foreign oil or from California oil. A duty of $1 a barrel on crude oil would mean an increase in cost of asphalt from about $7 a ton to at least $12, and perhaps more. This would greatly increase the cost of road building, especially on secondary roads where asphalt is used in large quantities, although it is also used in connection with the building of cement roads.

The increase in the cost of oil for heating would be approximately 25 per cent. As the distributing cost of heating, especially domestic heating, is very substantial, there is a less percentage increase in the cost of oil for such purposes than in the cost for industries using the oil for power purposes.

It seems doubtful whether the midcontinental fields would profit by the exclusion of foreign oil which constitutes only one-tenth of oil used in this country, for there is in the midcontinental fields a vast surplus which undoubtedly is the efficient cause in keeping down the price of oil in those fields.

The midcontinental people base their claim largely upon the fact that if foreign oil is excluded 100,000 oil workers will be given employment. This is an entirely fallacious argument for these oil workers will be employed only in opening up new fields, a most uneconomic procedure, which would tend still further to depress the price of oil.

If, on the other hand, it should prove that the price of oil is increased, then the big companies which have some six hundred million barrels in storage would profit immensely by the tariff, although some of them who operate in Mexico and Venezuela would have the value of their plants impaired.

These companies, however, could sell their oil in foreign countries. To-day one of the largest items of export from this country is oil, amounting to nearly $400,000,000 a year. We would lose a large part of this business, which, of course, would have the tendency to depress the industry still further in this country. In short, the duty on oil is not likely to help anybody, and certainly will seriously injure those located along the Atlantic coast, who consume practically 120,000,000 barrels of fuel oil a year.

EVERETT FACTORIES AND TERMINAL CORPORATION,
Everett, Mass., January 31, 1931.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a constituent of yours and a business man of greater Boston, I wish to state my views to you on the fuel-oil situation.

I would say, on the start, that I am as greatly interested in the oil business as I am in local industries—as I hold several thousand shares of oil stock, among which are Texas and the Standard of Indiana—and after giving the matter considerable study I wish to call your attention to the following facts:

Fuel oil is being used to a greater and greater extent for house heating, as well as power-plant operations. Our company run four boilers in our power plants and the Standard Mailing Machines Co., in which I am interested, also use oil for heating apparatus. As you are undoubtedly aware, the crude petroleum produced in this country is largely refined for gasoline and the percentage of fuel oil is comparatively small; whereas the Mexican and Venezuelan oils are heavy and produce a large quantity of fuel oil, so that the small benefit accruing to the oil-producing companies would be more than offset by the detriment to the consumers of fuel oil.

The further question of the rapid depletion of the oil resources in this country is a very far-reaching problem, and, with the embargo on importations, would tend to greater production and more rapid depletion.

Taking these facts into consideration and the far-reaching effects of an embargo, I trust you will use your efforts to see that this is not established.

Trusting you will accept this letter as an indication of the feeling of men who are interested in the welfare of the country on a broad scale, I remain,

Yours very truly,

ELMORE ANDREWS.

ATTLESBORO, MASS., February 12, 1931.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Clinton, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Situated as we are in New England, oil can be brought from Mexico and South America at a very small cost, and, as you undoubtedly have been informed, there was over 100,000,000 barrels of such oil consumed in the Atlantic seaport States in 1930, and of this amount about 70,000,000 was imported—therefore, is this embargo and tax, as proposed in these two bills, is passed on imported crude oil, it will mean that this supply coming from foreign countries will have to be made up from other sources in our own country, and, as you undoubtedly are aware, there is none of the crude oil to be found east of the Rocky Mountains. Therefore, if we are obliged to get our supply from the States situated on the western coast, it will mean a big increase in the freight on same. It now costs about 30 cents a barrel to have this oil delivered from Mexico and South America to our nearest port, Providence, R. I., and if the same has to be sent from the Pacific coast, it would add between 50 cents and $1 per barrel to our present cost.

In the last two or three years a great many New England manufacturers have installed oil-burning equipment because same is considerably cheaper to operate than coal and is far cleaner. If, however, these measures should be passed, it would undoubtedly force a great many industries to resort to burning coal again as they could not afford to pay the increased cost for the fuel oil over what coal can be bought in Providence for—about $5 a ton.

We believe that in this time of depression no legislation should be passed that would in any way hamper industry and that every measure should be taken to make it possible for manufacturing to operate their plants as cheaply and efficiently as possible. Such an embargo or tariff on crude oil as contemplated in these two bills by the United States against Latin American countries will, in our opinion, first, retard rather than assist in stabilizing the oil industry. Secondly, it will be a distinct discrimination against consumers in New England and the Atlantic seaboard States. It will also, as previously stated, aggravate the business depression from which it is now suffering, and fourth, it will decrease rather than increase the sale of domestic producers and refiners.

Thanking you in advance for giving this matter your careful consideration, we are

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN STEAMSHIP OWNERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York, January 28, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The American Steamship Owners' Association is deeply concerned by a report that another attempt will be made this year to levy a tariff or embargo on petroleum. Inasmuch as 90 per cent of the American merchant marine is oil burning, American shipowners have a vital interest in any proposal directly or indirectly affecting their fuel supply.

After a careful study of the situation this association is convinced that the proposed tariff or embargo is economically unsound and that either measure would work additional hardship on the American shipowner—

(a) By tending to raise the price of bunker fuel oil at Atlantic seaboard and Gulf ports.

(b) By placing the American shipowner, in common with other consumers of petroleum products, in the position of relying almost exclusively on American crude production, which while abundant enough at the present time can not last indefinitely if the entire burden of American demand is placed upon it, particularly in view of the fact that oil fields in the United States have been drained without restriction for a much longer period than foreign reserves.

At the present time the American merchant marine, in competition with European and Asiatic steamers, enjoys only one advantage, without which it would be unable to even support the competition which it is now able to maintain. This advantage is cheaper fuel oil for bunkers. Overhead due to higher first cost of operating expenses, salaries of officers and crew—every cost of operation of American merchant steamships is substantially higher than that of the boats of any competing nation. Should the present advantage in cost of fuel be taken away by a tariff act or an embargo which would send the bunker fuel from Mexico, Venezuela, and Colombia to Europe instead of to American bunkering ports, the hardship wrought to our transocean trade as well as to our coastal trade would be disastrous and irreparable.

The National Survey of Fuel Oil Distribution, a report of the United States Bureau of Mines, published last month, shows that in 1930, 94,131,000 barrels of fuel oil were used by American steamships. No more recent figures have been published. In that year there were imported and derived from foreign crude oils produced by American companies and transported in American-flag steamships, 71,600,000 barrels of fuel oil. This amount of fuel oil we are convinced could not be produced and transported to the Atlantic coast from domestic wells. The results of the exclusion of foreign oil by (1) a subtraction of this amount of fuel oil from its supplies, and (2) the diversion of this oil to foreign bunkering points would be a disaster surely not in the contemplation of the proponents of a tariff on oil.

As an indication of the cost to the American merchant marine the Mid-continent Royalty Owners Association in the year 1929, in its argument before the Senate Finance Committee in favor of a tariff on oil, admitted and gave figures tending to prove that a tariff of only $1 per barrel on crude and 50 per cent ad valorem on fuel oil would cost the American consumer of fuel oil $200,000,000 a year; and that of this, $52,179,000 would be paid in increased price by the American merchant marine. (Report of the hearings before the Committee on Finance, U. S. Senate, on H. R. 2667, schedule 16, free list, pp. 413–14.) This statement, an admission against interest, is certainly below the cost which the proposed combined specific and ad valorem tariffs would impose upon American steamships. Any increase at all in operating costs of steamers should be avoided.

Summing up, the American Steamship Owners' Association fails to see how the placing of a tariff or embargo upon imports of crude can do other than adversely affect American shipping and at the same time extend a boon to operators of foreign fleets by diverting cheap bunkers abroad; furthermore, it is convinced that such a proposal would not only fail to assist the American oil producer, but through the diversion of foreign production to other shores would stimulate refinery construction abroad, thus cutting down the demand for American-refined products, reducing refining activity in the United States and causing further unemployment.

The association therefore strongly urges you to assist the American merchant marine by keeping crude and fuel oil on the free list where all fuels have been from the beginning of American tariff history.

Respectfully submitted.

TAUNTON, MASS., January 30, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Taunton Municipal Lighting Plant Commission wishes to be recorded as against any tariff change or increase in import duty on fuel oil. Our generating plant consumed in 1931 90,559 barrels. An increase in the cost of fuel would, of course, have to be passed along to consumers of electric energy.

We will appreciate any effort on your part to prevent an increase in the cost of this commodity.

Very truly yours,

TAUNTON MUNICIPAL LIGHTING PLANT COMMISSION,
F. P. CALLAHAN, Chairman.

MASSACHUSETTS FISHERIES ASSOCIATION,
Boston, Mass., February 10, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The fishing industry of Massachusetts uses approximately 21,000,000 gallons of fuel oil annually, and the proposed tax on fuel oil or the duties which are asked on it, would work a decided hardship on the industry.

Practically every boat in this industry has lost money in the last two years of operation, and it is a foregone conclusion that the industry can not live through this depression, if we have additional burdens put on it. As a matter of fact, it will be very surprising if over half of the boats in the industry to-day do not change hands, and if the bankers are not forced to go into the fishing business.

You can readily see that a tax which has been proposed of 2 cents a gallon on Diesel oil would amount to more than $400,000 a year on this industry, and it simply can not exist under such a condition.

I hope, Senator, that you realize the importance of giving us your entire support in seeing that such a tax is not placed on our fuel oil. Even though it may be placed elsewhere, we ask that the fishing industry be exempted from this.

Last year we had a threat in the State of a tax of 3 or 4 cents per gallon on our fuel oil, and it took quite a bit of work on my part to whip this bill, and even now we are faced with it again in the coming session of the legislature.

It seems almost impossible to get the thought of the peculiarities of the fishing industry across to the legislators. It is not like other industries, and when taxes or penalties are put on us we can not pass them on to the retailer or consumer. The reason for this is that our product is sold from the boats at auction, and our price is controlled by the price of competing products, and if a penalty of $200,000, or of any amount, is put on the industry it must come out of the fishermen and the boat owners.

Thousands of our fishermen to-day are not making a living, and as I said before there is scarcely a boat that is not in the red at the present time.

The matter is of prime importance to Massachusetts's great fishing industry.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am,

Cordially yours,

E. H. COOLEY, Manager.

ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Boston, February 12, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Inclosed you will find copies of editorials, which have recently appeared in the Boston Herald, Boston Transcript, and Boston Traveler, in connection with proposals now pending before Congress designed to provide an embargo, tariff duty, or excise tax on imported oils and their derivatives.

These contributions appear to reflect the attitude of New England on this important matter.

Yours very truly,

O. L. STONE, General Manager.

BOSTON, MASS., March 12, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
U. S. Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: It is commonly reported that those in public life are always glad to have a word from their constituency, conveying views on important measures pending, to assist in the enactment of representative laws. Acting upon this premise, I am accordingly venturing to address you concerning a matter which is confronting you.

New England is burdened with a relatively high cost of fuel, due to the cost of transportation determined by geographical location. Manufacturers are subjected to similar increments on raw materials which enter into their fabrication, and careful study reveals that this has resulted in serious defection in industry, which has migrated to points nearer the source of these essentials.

As an engineer engaged in compensating, so far as possible, for these natural handicaps, I have found material aid in the substitution of the heavy fuel oil, identified as "Bunker C," and delivered at present to the coast of New England at a price of 60 cents per barrel. At this figure, our industrial establishments are encouraged to substitute it for coal, at a material saving in the cost of their manufactured product.

We are now informed, however, that the Congress proposes to place thereon a substantial tax, possibly as high as 1 cent per gallon, equivalent to 42 cents per barrel, or 70 per cent ad valorem. This, sir, I assure you, if realized, will eliminate the advantage now enjoyed by this fuel, and will deprive our manufacturers of the relief now sought. It would hardly appear to protect the inland domestic oil producers, already favored by geographical position, in competition with imported product. Nor would it seem to promise opportunity for large revenue, since the higher cost will terminate extension of its use, and effect a reversion to coal.

There is in this office a practical and typical illustration. I have made an investigation and report for a client, advising the substitution of oil for coal in his power plant. Since the threatened imposition of a tax levy on the former, I have been obliged to withdraw the recommendation, pending the disposition of the bill. If any substantial burden is placed upon this item it will cause the abandonment of the proposed measure of economy. Similar cases are in prospect.

In addition to that upon the manufacturers the effect upon the engineers, now struggling under present conditions for existence, is obvious.

I am, accordingly, endeavoring to add this feeble plea in support of your own respected judgment, backed by the strength of your position, to prevent this additional handicap which the industry of New England, and particularly of Massachusetts, can ill bear.

Yours very truly,

WALTER A. HALL.

EAST BOSTON, MASS., March 10, 1932.

Mr. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We understand that the matter of additional tariff on crude-oil products will come up in the near future, and as an increase in the price of fuel oil will materially affect every manufacturer, either directly or indirectly, in Massachusetts, we wish to voice our protest on extra import duties on oil in the crude as used under the boilers of power-developing plants.

The power cost to-day of a textile plant varies between 20 to 35 per cent of the total pay roll, and the bulk of this charge in the small plant is in fuel costs. It is of vital importance to the small plant that the price of fuel be cheap, as it represents its only opportunity to compete with plants of the larger public utilities, from whom they must buy when the price of fuel is high and controlled.

It is the writer's personal opinion that an extra duty on fuel oil will result in higher all-round power cost, which is only going to benefit a few in comparison to those it will harm.

Yours very truly,

MAVERICK MILLS,
J. MCELROY, Superintendent.

BOSTON, MASS., March 7, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have no doubt that you are fully aware of the far-reaching consequences of the proposed tax on foreign oil, but in the event that some of the immediate effects have escaped you, we are taking this opportunity to call one angle of the situation to your attention.

We have an office in Caracas, Venezuela, and have pending with the Venezuelan Government contracts approximating $20,000,000. Venezuela is an exceedingly rich field for American trade and customers. The Venezuelan people and Government are exceedingly friendly to the United States and its citizens. The proposed oil tax will seriously impair the governmental income of Venezuela and the immediate effect will be serious impairment or total loss of business to American firms like ourselves.

According to newspaper reports, the latest proposal is to impose a duty of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline or oils from which gasoline is made. One cent per gallon on gasoline does not seem prohibitive, but 1 cent per gallon upon crude oil, as we interpret it, means virtually 1 cent per gallon on fuel oil. A tax of 1 cent would undoubtedly mean an increase in price of that amount, which might well mean from 12½ per cent to 25 per cent increase in cost of fuel oil in New England. An advance of this kind would, of course, affect other fuels equally. Can New England sit by and see the cost of heating her homes and running her factories increased by these percentages while their business prospects are destroyed in one of the most fertile fields in the world, all because of some immediate benefit to a few owners of oil leases in the Southwest?

Very truly yours,

CHASE & GILBERT (INC.),
By KINSLEY VAN R. DEY,
Vice President.

ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Boston, March 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The Associated Industries of Massachusetts urges you to vote against the 1 cent per gallon excise tax on imported gasoline, gas oil, fuel, and crude oil proposed in H. R. 10236, known as the bill "to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes," and to have that item eliminated from the measure.

The imposition of this excise tax means additional costs to New England users of gasoline and light and heavy fuel oil of not less than $100,000,000 a year.

When the House Ways and Means Committee was engaged in the work of preparing the new revenue bill, which is designed to balance the Federal Budget, its members referred to the United States Treasury officials the proposal to raise revenue by a so-called excise tax on imported oil, with a request for information as to how much the Treasury estimated it would produce in revenue annually.

The Treasury reported it would produce not one cent of revenue; and the Ways and Means Committee, convinced that such was the case, practically dropped all consideration of an excise tax on imported oil.

As soon as this fact was learned by proponents of a tariff duty or excise tax on imported oil they hurriedly brought together 40 Members of Congress from the States of Oklahoma, Kansas, Texas, and mid-continent fields who threatened they would join with others in opposing the manufacturers' sales tax, which constitutes the principal revenue-producing item in the bill, unless an excise of 1 cent per gallon on imported oil was provided for by the committee.

Fifteen members of the Ways and Means Committee, fearing that the revenue bill would fail of passage if the threat was not heeded, yielded to these importunities Saturday morning, March 5, and wrote the excise-tax rate into the bill as a means of saving the entire measure, while nine members of the committee opposed such a course.

This action constituted an example of the misused power of a determined minority of less than 10 per cent of the House membership, and it is clearly apparent that a majority of the Ways and Means Committee acted under threat, well knowing that there can not possibly be any income derived under the proposal, inasmuch as the excise tax will automatically stop the importation into this country in any considerable volume of crude fuel oil and gasoline.

In issuing its report, Acting Chairman CRISP, of the Ways and Means Committee, stated that not more than $5,000,000 annual income would be received by the Government from this excise tax, a very insignificant sum, were it actually realized, when compared with the total revenue of $1,246,000,000, which the committee anticipates will be derived from the provisions of the bill if enacted in the form it was reported.

The committee's contention that the excise tax of 1 cent per gallon will yield $5,000,000 annually is an admission in itself that some 74,000,000 barrels out of a total annual importation of 86,000,000 barrels at the present time will be barred from the American market and sold abroad.

The inevitable result of the proposed tax will be to materially increase the cost to users of gasoline, fuel oil, and asphalt; and in view of the comparatively small amount of revenue expected or hoped for, the conclusion is inevitable that this tax was inserted, not for the purpose of producing Federal revenue commensurate with the cost of collection but to placate the proponents of a tariff, excise tax, or embargo on imported oil, and of securing assurance of the support of the congressional delegations from the mid-continent fields in behalf of the sales-tax principle of the bill.

Plainly and obviously it is a castigation of New England and the Atlantic seaboard States for the delectation of the mid-continent oil fields.

To one not familiar with the oil situation it may be difficult to understand why there should be such a difference between the ultimate cost to the consumer and the amount of the tax.

More than 90 per cent of all the crude oil imported into the United States comes from Venezuela, Colombia, and Mexico, from fields developed, owned, and operated by American capital, employing American labor and using American-flag tankers.

Thus this proposed excise tax on imported oil is a simon-pure tax on American business.

The cost of water transportation from these foreign fields to the Atlantic coast is much less than the freight costs from the domestic mid-continent oil fields, hence the price of gasoline on the eastern seaboard States is governed by the price of gasoline produced from Central American crude oil.

It is perfectly obvious that the proposed tax on imported crude oil will automatically increase the cost of gasoline and therefore the price of domestic gasoline will advance to equal it.

In other words, imported gasoline now acts as a price stabilizer by providing competition on the Atlantic seaboard.

We appreciate the serious condition of the oil industry in the Southwest, but this condition is due in no material degree to the importation of foreign oil, which constitutes less than 9 per cent of the total consumption in this country. The difficulties of the industry in that section are due to three causes:

(1) The excessive cost of transportation by pipe lines owned by the big companies. Some of these companies earn from 300 to 400 per cent on the cost of their plants;

(2) The fact that the price of oil is determined by the big companies, which price is posted, and everyone who sells has to accept that price or go without sale.

(3) The overhanging menace of a tremendous surplus (this is, perhaps, the most important). If the flush wells alone were opened up to full capacity, they would produce five times as much oil as could be consumed.

During the Teapot Dome controversy the Federal Oil Conservation Board urged American companies to invest in foreign oil fields in order to conserve domestic resources, thus deferring the time when we may be entirely dependent upon imported oil in periods of stress and necessity.

American companies heeded the request, invested heavily in Central America, and erected refineries on the Atlantic seaboard, where extensive operations are now being carried on.

If the tax reduces imports from 86,000,000 to 12,000,000 barrels annually, as the figures announced by the sponsors of the revenue bill indicate, it is inevitable that these refineries will either be forced to operate at a reduced rate or shut down entirely, thus adding to existing unemployment.

Hundreds of manufacturing plants, steamship lines, fishing fleets, hotels, etc., in New England are using fuel oil exclusively for power and heating purposes and consume annually upward of 20,000,000 barrels of this fuel, or about 850,000,000 gallons.

In addition, there are upwards of 100,000 families in Massachusetts alone using light fuel oil in their homes, and to them a tax of 1 cent per gallon means a material increase in their fuel bills.

Through its taxation committee, this association several weeks ago informed Acting Chairman CRISP and other members of the House Ways and Means Committee of its approval of the principle involved in a manufacturers' sales tax, levied at the source of final production, so as to prevent pyramiding, and we approve of the sales-tax plan that has been presented in H. R. 10236.

This tax will bear equitably on all licensed manufacturers throughout the country; but the same can not be said of the excise tax on imported gasoline, gas oil, fuel, and crude oil, because it will apply only to the Atlantic seaboard, which is dependent upon the imported fuel. This situation is due to our great distance from the domestic fields, which precludes shipments of mid-continent oil to this section of the country at a price making it economically feasible to use it.

The imposition of the tax will mean that those now using light and heavy fuel oils will be obliged to junk their oil-burning apparatus and return to the use of coal, thus again placing this section at the mercy of the coal operators, who will rejoice in having their present fuel-oil competition removed.

In the case of hundreds of manufacturing and other concerns using fuel oil for power purposes it will mean heavy expenditures in installing coal-burning boilers, and already some textile concerns are seriously considering liquidating if the tax is imposed because of their financial inability to revamp their boiler equipment.

Below we give a few statistics showing what the added cost would be annually to manufacturing concerns in Massachusetts now using fuel oil if they continued to use that commodity in lieu of coal in the same average quantity as in 1929, 1930, and 1931:

	Barrels	Gallons	Tax at 1 cent per gallon
American Printing Co., Fall River	375,000	15,750,000	$157,500.00
American Sugar Refining Co., Boston	70,000	2,940,000	29,400.00
Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Quincy	35,000	1,470,000	14,700.00
Braintree Electric Light Co., Braintree	60,000	2,520,000	25,200.00
Copley-Plaza Operating Co., Boston	25,000	1,050,000	10,500.00
Eastern Steamship Lines (Inc.), Boston	680,000	28,560,000	285,600.00
Falulah Paper Co., Fitchburg	50,000	2,100,000	21,000.00
First National Stores (Inc.), Somerville	35,000	1,470,000	14,700.00
Ford Motor Co., Somerville	30,000	1,260,000	12,600.00
Mount Hope Finishing Co., North Dighton	191,000	8,022,000	80,220.00
M. T. Stevens & Sons Co., North Andover	96,000	4,032,000	40,320.00
Strathmore Paper Co., West Springfield	47,294	1,986,348	19,863.48
Pacific Mills, Lawrence	650,000	27,300,000	273,000.00
American Woolen Co., Lawrence	700,000	29,400,000	294,000.00

We believe there exists no justification for the inclusion of what is essentially a tariff item in a revenue bill, and especially when it is realized that it is inserted solely as a political gesture.

The question is whether this section should submit to an excise tax, which the Treasury says is uneconomic and nonproductive of revenue, and which will mean increased costs amounting to more than a hundred millions of dollars to New England, or whether we should stand up for our rights and enter our objections to being used as a cat's-paw to obtain mere political advantage in behalf of a bill which ought to be so framed as to provide a plan of taxation equitable to all parts of the country alike.

Very truly yours,

O. L. STONE, General Manager.

HUDSON WORSTED CO.,
Hudson, Mass., March 14, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see the proposition in the new tax bill to put 1 cent per gallon excise tax on various kinds of gasoline and light and heavy fuel oils.

Now, as a large user of gasoline and heavy fuel oil I wish to enter a protest against this tax. It means so much to New England manufacturers who are using fuel oils and fleets of trucks on fuel oil; it means almost 100 per cent advance in price, and as the Treasury Department's estimate is that it will only bring in about $5,000,000 in taxes, why saddle New England manufacturers with $100,000,000 to raise $5,000,000?

We believe that there are a lot of economies that could be made in Government expenditures that would save considerably more than this tax, especially in the amount of literature the Government sends out.

I trust you will see your way to oppose this tax on oil for fuel purposes and gasoline, I am,

Sincerely yours,

H. T. DYSON.

FALL RIVER, MASS., April 18, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The tax on fuel oil which the Government is going to establish will mean $12,000 a year additional to the Charlton Mills, in Fall River, and you know very well that the textile industry the last four years has been in a very precarious position.

We have tried to give as much employment to our help as possible, but with an additional tax of this kind it will simply cripple us.

Anything you can do for us will be greatly appreciated.

Yours truly,

CHARLTON MILLS,
JAMES SINCLAIR, Treasurer.

BIGELOW-SANFORD CARPET CO. (INC.),
Thompsonville, Conn., April 23, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a resident of Longmeadow, Mass., and as consulting engineer for Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co. (Inc.), with mills at Clinton, Mass., Thompsonville, Conn., and Amsterdam, N. Y., I am interested in bringing to your attention the proposed tax on fuel oil.

When this tax was proposed, fuel oil was selling at a bunker price of 60 cents per barrel at Providence, Boston, and Portland. Inasmuch as a barrel holds 42 gallons, the 1-cent tax as proposed would mean 42 cents on a commodity which cost 60 cents, or a tax of approximately 70 per cent. Recently, however, the price of fuel oil per barrel has advanced at the ports mentioned to 65 cents per barrel, and the proposed tax thus becomes approximately 64½ per cent.

It hardly seems possible that Congress should apply to a commodity of this sort taxes which become in effect a prohibitive tariff.

We are now using Bunker C oil at our Clinton plant. We propose installing equipment to use this oil at our Thompsonville plant, but, needless to say, this proposition has been deferred pending the action of Congress.

I realize that the House has shown conclusively that the sales tax is dead, but I wish to protest the proposed tax upon imported fuel oils whether for commercial or for domestic use. I would, therefore, urge you and those associated with you to give careful thought not only to the proposed taxation on fuel oil but to the excessive cost of government. Whereas general living conditions have decreased markedly during the last two and one-half years, the cost of Federal, State, county, and town Government appears to have increased.

Any cooperation that you can give in reducing the cost of government and likewise decrease the amount of tax necessary to operate our Government institutions will at this time materially help to stimulate business and relieve what appears to be an unnecessary burden.

Yours very truly,

E. WADSWORTH STONE,
Research and Consulting Engineer.

LAWRENCE, MASS., March 15, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We hope you will vote against 1 cent per gallon excise tax on imported fuel oil and crude. It means an increase in the cost of our products that can only be offset by further reduction in wages already too low. It is an unfair burden on consumers and manufacturers in New England which will help the oil companies toward stronger monopoly and higher prices in this section as compared to others. It is unfair; the revenue it will produce is small, according to the Treasury Department; its harm great, and probably the more so in New England of anywhere. This unfair effort to milk New England for the benefit of a small minority in the House should not be tolerated in a bill which in most other respects has been so fairly framed for the interests of the country as a whole. We hope you will not only vote against it but will also vigorously oppose and expose its unrighteousness.

JOHN W. BOLTON & SONS CO.

WORCESTER, MASS., March 14, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

We protest enactment part of House bill 10236, relative excise tax on petroleum and its derivatives. Enactment would cost New England manufacturers $100,000,000 annually while providing no revenue. Tax is prohibitory and unjustified, since difficulties of American oil producers not caused by foreign competition but by circumstances relative excessive production pipe-line costs, etc.

GRATON & KNIGHT CO.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have taken a little time to look up the tariff record of the Senator from Massachusetts and also the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], to whose eloquent speech to-day I listened throughout. I find in the RECORD, from what I could glean—perhaps the chairman of the Finance Committee might inform me—that the Senator from Georgia supported in the last tariff bill a tariff of about $2 upon sand containing silica of 97 per cent or more—so that even the common, ordinary sand that might be used for the gizzard of the chicken was to be taxed. More than 120,000,000 people would be affected by that.

I find further that pitch and tar and clay and rayon duties seem to have received the very masterly support of the Senator from Georgia. If I have made a mistake, I want to know it.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; the Senator has made several mistakes. I voted for lower duties and made the fight jointly with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who would bear me out if he were present.

Mr. LONG. The Senator voted for a duty of 38 cents.

Mr. GEORGE. I voted for lower duties always on rayon. Of course, I had to vote for the lower of the two things that were presented.

Mr. LONG. The Senator offered an amendment, and the lowest amount offered in his amendment was 38 cents, and the bill only provided for 45 cents.

Mr. GEORGE. That was a good deal lower than the rate called for in the bill. I voted for lower duties. I voted for duties upon farm products, and I did vote, as I said in my address, to prevent a reduction of the duty on clay.

Mr. LONG. Did not the Senator also ask for a tariff on sand?

Mr. GEORGE. I did not.

Mr. LONG. The Senator did not vote for a tariff on sand?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know about any vote upon a matter of that kind.

Mr. LONG. The RECORD, as I remember it, showed that the Senator voted for a tariff of $2 a ton on sand.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not ask for a duty on sand at all.

Mr. LONG. But the RECORD shows the Senator voted for it.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not care what the RECORD shows; I did not ask for it. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] asked for a duty on sand, and he would bear me out in my statement if he were here.

Mr. LONG. I find also from the RECORD I have just been reviewing that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] voted for a number of these tariff items, particularly on goods manufactured in Massachusetts, including boots and shoes, things worn by every human being on the globe; harness that went on the backs of horses; knives, table forks, spoons; bicycles for young children; tricycles for babies—all of which were voted for, as I understand, because those items are produced in Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest to the Senator that before he attempts to call attention to the votes of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, whose splendid public service needs no defense, and other Senators he produce the record?

Mr. LONG. I have it upon my desk and I shall be glad to produce it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator has been able, in the brief time I have been talking, to consult the record of the votes and the arguments pro and con and obtain a complete idea of the reasons for our position, he has a very rapidly moving mind.

Mr. LONG. I had very able help, and we looked up the Senator's record, and we did not find any tariff item in which Massachusetts was interested, as I recollect, that the Senator did not vote in favor of it. It may be that there were some we did not look up.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has not made a very accurate statement. I leave it to my colleagues, who have been here longer than has the Senator from Louisiana, if I have not shown a very independent course toward the demands of my constituents for high protective tariff duties. I have stood on this floor again and again and have voted against them, though I have voted for duties in some cases where it seemed to me the facts indicating steadily increasing imports were justified; and not only that, but, as a Democrat from a Republican protective tariff State, I have voted against Republican tariff bills. I think that is a record to which I can point with some satisfaction as a Democrat.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts in the course of his remarks stated that the United States was an immense exporter of copper. I have before me some very accurate figures recently compiled by the Department of Commerce and the Tariff Commission.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. For what year?

Mr. HAYDEN. For the years 1929, 1930, and 1931.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do the figures represent the average for the three years?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the figures are separate for each year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My figures were only for the year 1931, and were based on value rather than tons.

Mr. HAYDEN. The figures I have are for each separate year. The United States was a net importer of copper in two ways, a net importer of copper to the extent of 54,322 tons, excluding manufactures of copper, in 1929; of 94,487 tons in 1930; and of 56,515 tons in 1931. Including manufactures of copper, the United States was a net importer of copper in 1929 to the extent of 460 tons; in 1930 to the extent of 42,203; and in 1931 to the extent of 20,349 tons; and at the rate of the importations for the past six months, if they are carried through for the remainder of the year, the United States will be a net importer of copper, excluding manufactures, of 223,408, and, including manufactures, of 194,512 tons.

I thought, Mr. President, for the sake of the RECORD and for the sake of accuracy, that these figures should be made known.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I concede that I may be mistaken, although I want the Senator to know that in preparing the minority report I sought to check up the figures very carefully and very accurately, and I thought they were accurate. I repeat, the difference may be due to my use of the values of the imports, while the Senator uses tons.

Let me say further that I observe from what the Senator himself has read, confirmatory of my argument, that there has been a decrease in the importations of copper in 1931 as compared to 1930 of 50 per cent, showing that the importations are going down and not up.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was true for the fiscal year 1931 as compared to the fiscal year 1930, but immediately after that, during the past six months, there has been a tremendous increase in the importations of copper.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to review the matter, and very frankly on the floor to-morrow, if I find I am mistaken, make public declaration of the figures that I find to be correct. I have no desire to mislead my fellow associates in this Chamber——

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure of that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no desire to resort to trickery or resort to deception or misunderstanding.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I make no criticism of the motives of other men; I seek to base my action upon facts as they appear to me, and I concede to my fellow Senators the right to use their own conscientious judgment, as I try to do.

Mr. HAYDEN. Believing that and being sure the Senator had unwittingly included in the minority report a statement which to my knowledge can not be verified by the facts, I have taken the trouble to obtain these figures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bailey	Davis	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dickinson	Keyes	Shortridge
Barbour	Fess	La Follette	Smith
Barkley	George	Lewis	Smoot
Bingham	Glass	Logan	Steiwer
Borah	Glenn	Long	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Goldsborough	McGill	Townsend
Brookhart	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Broussard	Hale	Morrison	Tydings

Bulow	Hatfield	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hawes	Norbeck	Watson
Carey	Hayden	Norris	Wheeler
Cohen	Hebert	Nye
Connally	Hull	Oddie

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Senate. After speaking for about 30 minutes he yielded for an executive session. His speech will be published entire.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an executive session?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order. If there are no reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Orsen N. Nielsen to be secretary, Diplomatic Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

The legislative clerk read the nomination of T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, because of the illness of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who requested that the nomination be passed over, I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George A. Welsh to be United States district judge, eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Judge Welsh.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what reason there is for notifying the President so promptly?

Mr. REED. I am aware it is a departure from our usual rule, but the calendar in the eastern district of Pennsylvania is clogged with an accumulation of business. This vacancy has existed for a considerable time, and the present judges are utterly unable to cope with the work. It is merely that a week or so may be saved in disposing of business of importance in that district. I know of no other reason.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the President will be notified.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of B. B. Montgomery to be United States marshal, northern district of Mississippi.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edwin G. Williams to be passed assistant surgeon, Public Health Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson, of the Bethany Baptist Church of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Eternal God, we draw near to Thee at this hour because Thou has been with our fathers in every crisis of our history. We thank Thee for the help, aid, and assistance that Thou hast given them in those trials. Help us to realize our need of Thee in this hour that is testing the very souls of men. Guide us and lead us so that we may learn from our errors, correct our mistakes, follow Thy light, and do Thy will. We ask Thy blessing to rest upon our country and upon all who are in authority. Fill us with peace, prosperity, and power. May we as a people honor Thee by doing Thy will and glorifying Thy name at all times and in all ways. We ask it in the Master's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

S. 1335. An act to remove the limitation upon the filling of vacancy of district judge for the district of New Jersey.

Also a further message by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announcing that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6477) entitled "An act to further extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War residing in the United States."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1335. An act to remove the limitation upon the filling of vacancy of district judge for the district of New Jersey; and

S. 2498. An act to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public land in the District of Columbia.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment to this paragraph.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the pending amendment read for the information of the House?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: Page 71, line 4, strike out the paragraph ending in line 20.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation carried in this War Department appropriation bill during the past several years for the construction, repair, and maintenance of roads, tramways, ferries, bridges, and trails in the Territory of Alaska has been $800,000 a year. This year the Bureau of the Budget reduced that appropriation to $656,000 for the next fiscal year. This War Department subcommittee has further reduced that amount to $354,310 for the coming fiscal year, and the amendment now under consideration, offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], is to strike out that entire amount and leave no appropriation whatever for any work of that kind throughout the entire Territory of Alaska for the next fiscal year.

I most earnestly ask the House to carefully consider the very serious and in fact disastrous effect of this amendment. There are at the present time about 1,750 miles of wagon roads in the Territory, and about 1,400 miles of dogsled roads, and approximately 7,300 miles of trails, besides some 700 miles of what are called flagged trails. The actual annual maintenance of those roads and trails, without any substantial extensions or improvements, costs about $600,000 a year; and there is a very great need throughout Alaska for many more roads and trails for the proper development of that Territory.

Everyone who has ever visited Alaska knows that roads and trails are absolutely necessary for the purpose of any and practically all development in the Territory. The climatic conditions and the topography and character of the country make it imperatively necessary to constantly keep these roads and trails in repair. The deep snows and the spring and summer floods and torrential rains make road construction and road repair—and especially road maintenance—enormously expensive.

I speak from personal observation and knowledge of the conditions in Alaska. The Interior Department Appropriation Subcommittee, of which I have had the honor to be the present chairman and a member for many years, has twice visited Alaska. Last August, Mr. MURPHY, of Ohio, and Mr. HASTINGS, of Oklahoma, and I, as three members of that committee, made quite a careful study of the needs of the Territory in all respects. We were accompanied by the chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, Mr. LEAVITT, of Montana, and the chairman of the Public Lands Committee, Mr. COLTON, of Utah, and others. And I am confident that every one of those gentlemen will substantiate what I say. We went from Seward to Fairbanks on the railroad. We stopped on the way and visited the Mount McKinley National Park. We returned from Fairbanks over the Richardson Highway from Fairbanks, nearly 400 miles to Valdez. That is not only the most wonderful highway in Alaska but it is one of the marvelous highways of the world. I can not take time to describe it or give its tremendous importance to the development of that Territory, but I will say that the Board of Road Commissioners of Alaska and the Army engineers and their assistants have done a wonderful work in the construction of that road, as well as in the maintenance of it. It is practically impossible to construct any road of any length in Alaska that will not require constant repair. No amount of skill can entirely guard against the deep snows, the melting glaciers, and the terrific floods. Bridges and large portions of this and all other roads are washed out at some time. We were compelled to have our automobiles pulled through several rivers by caterpillar tractors.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman inform the committee how much money the Federal Government has already expended in building roads and trails, bridges, and in highway construction in the Territory of Alaska to date?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The total amount expended for that purpose from 1905 to June 30, 1931, was $17,273,794.62. Of that amount Alaska has contributed $3,769,418.62, and there have been some contributions from other funds and sources.

There are five Army officers connected with the work of the Alaska Road Commission who receive a total of $21,020.92 for salaries and allowances.

The Richardson Highway original construction cost $2,732,000, and the maintenance and improvement of it to June 30, 1931, was $3,820,000, making a total cost to that date of $6,552,000, of which amount Alaska contributed about $2,600,000.

I may say to the gentleman from Alabama that from the time our country purchased Alaska from Russia for $7,200,000 on March 30, 1867, to December 31, 1931, our Government has spent all told $200,117,286.92 in Alaska, and our country has received in return from Alaska $50,357,660.65 in the form of money going into our Federal Treasury. Aside from that, Alaska has produced principally in fish, minerals, and furs about two and one-half billion dollars that has been taken out of that Territory by citizens of our country and brought into the United States. Besides that, the citizens of Alaska have purchased merchandise from our country to the amount of $889,232,561. It is one of the richest possessions that any nation in the world has ever had. Its white population of about 28,000 are courageous, pioneer, red-blooded, loyal, and splendid American citizens, who are, against frightful obstacles, doing their level best to develop and make homes in that marvelously rich and wonderful Territory of our Government.

They richly deserve all the encouragement and support that Congress can ever give them. Alaska has no public debt and the lowest tax rates of any place under the American flag. For 50 years it has produced more gold every year than we paid Russia for the entire Territory that is one-fifth as large as the entire United States. It is often said that it is "conservationed to death"; that is, it has more government per capita, less liberty, and more harmful congressional limitations upon its material development than any other place under our flag. There are about 15,000 Indians and about the same number of Eskimos scattered throughout that vast region. I wish you could all visit Alaska some time.

To anyone who knows anything about the climate and roads and conditions in the Territory it is absolutely cruel and unspeakably outrageous to refuse for even a year to make any appropriations for the maintenance of the roads and trails throughout that region. Alaska can not possibly be developed without roads and trails. In fact the people could not exist there without them. People must be able to travel about the country, especially by dog teams, about eight months in every year. Our country is in great need of the production of more gold. Mines can not operate unless they are accessible. The Government must open and improve and maintain the roads very largely, although it is true that Alaska contributes about 30 per cent toward all the road and trail construction. And when you consider the very limited resources of those people you must admit they are doing mighty well when they do that much.

Our Federal-aid road 50-50 law does not apply to Alaska at all. For that reason we have never made road appropriations up there in the way we have made fabulous appropriations for the much more wealthy States of our Union. Our Nation has a vast and enormous stake in Alaska. We can not afford to let it deteriorate, and we certainly can not afford to discourage or dishearten those people who all came from our States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to the fact that before the committee rose on Tuesday a motion prevailed that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto should close in five minutes. Under those circumstances the debate on this paragraph is closed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion was made and debated.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Is it not a fact that when we were in the Mount McKinley National Park last summer we saw a road in process of construction which was to extend to the gold fields, west of the park, which promised great additions to our gold supply?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. The gentleman from Massachusetts was with us and his statement is correct. We who were there all know it would be absolutely suicidal on our part to cut out this appropriation for road construction and road repair and upkeep in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. If I remember correctly the statement was made on the floor the other day that Alaska does not contribute anything to road building. There are two funds in Alaska which go into road building. One is known as the Alaska fund, which comes from certain business licenses, and the other is an annual or biennial appropriation made by the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is true, and our Government contributes but 70 per cent.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want it perfectly plain that Alaska's contribution is about $50,000,000 annually. The gentleman did not make that clear.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not that amount annually, but all told.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is about $2,500,000,000 all told, but $50,000,000 annually.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I said Alaska has since we purchased the Territory in 1867 produced about $2,500,000,000 in wealth. That is what the gentleman means.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; from Alaska.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I was talking about cash while the gentleman was talking about the output of fish, minerals, furs, and everything else that has been taken out of Alaska. I am talking about the money that went into the Federal Treasury from Alaska. That sum since 1867 has been about $50,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not true that if this appropriation should be stricken from the bill it would result in false economy, because the roads deteriorate very fast?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It would mean almost an utter destruction of all we have expended on roads and trails in Alaska. If those roads are allowed to go without maintenance for one year, it would mean that we would practically have to start all over again. Gentlemen, Congress absolutely must continue this road and trail work in that Territory. If we do not, our country will suffer an enormous loss and we will be most wrongfully and cruelly inflicting an irreparable injury and loss upon 28,000 as splendid people as there are anywhere on this globe. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to do an injustice to any of our territorial possessions, certainly none to Alaska. I repeat what I said last Tuesday. I think we owe a special duty to the natives of Alaska, and probably it is more serious than the duty we owe to our own American citizens there, in view of the fact that they are our wards.

I recognize that we have brought from Alaska goods amounting in value to vast sums, but let us not forget that the bringing in of goods, so far as the amount is concerned, has receded as the years have passed. Let us not forget that we have already expended hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars in the Territory of Alaska. Let us not forget that there are only 25,000 white people there and all told, counting our Eskimo population, less than 60,000 people in the Territory of Alaska. Let us not forget that if what the gentleman from California says is true, and if what the gentleman from Colorado says is true, there will be enough funds provided by the Territory itself to do all of the maintenance work on all the necessary roads and trails in Alaska.

The idea of maintaining 3,100 miles of highways in Alaska for the use of less than 60,000 people is perfectly preposterous to me.

We have a railroad in Alaska, built, if you please, to tap the coal fields of Alaska, and I am reliably informed that they have to go to Canada to buy coal with which to run that railroad.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. They have now gotten to the point where they can use some of the coal of the Alaskan mines, and they are using it on this railroad.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I appreciate the interest gentlemen show in Alaska. The gentleman from Washington is a neighbor of Alaska; the gentleman from Colorado is interested in the Interior Department appropriation bill, and it is but natural for them to be interested. They have been there; they have been on the ground; but I have not. I am not an expert on Alaska, but I make the statement—which I do not think can be successfully contradicted—that if the Territory of Alaska is contributing anything at all to the funds for roads in Alaska those funds will be ample to take care of the maintenance of the roads, trails, and bridges in Alaska for the fiscal year of 1933.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] said the other day—and he was there also—that he saw a beautiful boulevard built in a forest, if you please, and that a vast sum of money had been expended for a wonderful bridge over a stream. That boulevard started in the forest and ended in the forest, and was paid for, if you please, largely by the money of the taxpayers of the United States.

It is true we have brought much goods from Alaska, but we are not continuing at the great rate of former years. Compared with the States of the Union, certainly, no man will say that the returns to the Public Treasury, according to the figures quoted by some gentlemen here and according to the figures placed in the RECORD by the distinguished Delegate from Alaska, are at all comparable. We are spending several million dollars more a year annually upon the Alaskan Territory from the Public Treasury than the receipts to the Treasury from the Territory.

I submit to you that at a time like this, when we are trying to effect economy in government, no individual in Alaska will be hurt by striking out this little appropriation. No loss will occur to the people of Alaska if we strike this item out, and I submit again that it should be stricken from this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 50, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation; for survey of northern and northwestern lakes, and other boundary and connecting waters as heretofore authorized, including the preparation, correction, printing, and issuing of charts and bulletins and the investigation of lake levels; for prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City; for expenses of the California Débris Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act approved March 1, 1893 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 661); and for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors: Provided, That no funds shall be expended for any preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate not authorized by law, $59,277,095: Provided further, That no part of any appropriation expended under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers shall be available for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles or launches, speed boats, or other similar small motor-propelled boats unless there shall be a specific appropriation therefor.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the proviso beginning on page 72, line 17, and ending with the word "therefor," in line 22.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: Page 72, line 17, strike out the proviso beginning in line 17 and ending in line 22.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume there was some real purpose to correct an abuse when the gentleman's committee sought to ban the purchase of launches, speedboats, and other motor-propelled boats for the use of the engineers of the Army.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is exactly right, as he generally is——

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank the gentleman for that nice verbal bouquet.

Mr. COLLINS. We found that in a number of instances river and harbor funds had been used to purchase expensive speedboats—speedboats entirely out of proportion in size and cost to the necessities of the occasion—with the result that we thought we should require those in charge of the expenditure of these appropriations to furnish the Congress estimates of proposed expenditures for speedboats and small motor-propelled boats and similar craft, the same as they are required to do as to passenger-carrying vehicles; but we understand now that this provision, in view of the nearness of the commencement of the next fiscal year, might prevent the engineers from buying any boats, however necessary they might be, because it will be impracticable for them to furnish estimates as to their needs in time for inclusion in this bill. In addition to this General Brown has assured the committee that during the next fiscal year no boats will be bought except those that are absolutely essential and requisitions for which have come under his very close scrutiny.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought there was such a superfluity of motor boats in connection with the work of the Corps of Engineers that for one year at least there might be a respite in the purchase of these expensive boats.

Mr. COLLINS. Ordinarily I think the amendment should be carried, but I doubt very much the advisability of carrying it in the bill so late in the year.

Mr. STAFFORD. My own idea was that it should not be carried forever and ever, but there might be a respite just for one year, to let them dispose of some boats, where they have an excess number of them, and place a ban on the purchase of new boats for the time being. It was my opinion this provision would not do any violent injury to the service.

Mr. COLLINS. I do not think there will be any abuse next year, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 72, line 16, after the word "law," strike out "$59,277,095" and insert "$53,277,095."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to cut from the rivers and harbors appropriation the sum of $6,000,000, or approximately 10 per cent of the total appropriation. This appropriation is divided, in the estimates that were furnished the committee, on the basis of approximately $37,000,000 for new construction and approximately $22,000,000 for maintenance.

I appreciate there are a large number of Members in this House who believe that the work they expected last summer they were going to get will be affected by this amendment and, perhaps, their vote will be influenced on this account; but let me call their attention to the facts that now exist. You know and I know that all contracts for public improvements are being let now on a basis at least 20 to 25 per cent below the letting figures of the 1st of last July and the 1st of last August, when these estimates were made up.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I will not, because I have not the time.

You know and I know that with the money that will be carried in the bill after this 10 per cent cut there is no question in the world but what just as much in results can be had and just as much work can be accomplished as the Chief of Engineers figured would be accomplished when these figures were put together and $75,000,000 was sent by the Chief of Engineers to the Bureau of the Budget the 1st of last August or the 1st of last September.

Having in mind the reduction in material prices, and having in mind the reduction in labor prices, the Bureau of the Budget cut these figures from $75,000,000 to $60,000,000, and the committee cut them about $700,000. Now, if you cut 10 per cent more and reduce it to about $54,000,000, you will still leave enough, in my opinion, to let them do everything they planned to do when they first made the figures up.

A lot is said about the number of workmen to be affected by this sort of thing. With all the work that is going on, and all that is carried in the bills that have so far gone through Congress, the new construction work will provide employment with the $175,000,000 or $200,000,000 for something like 100,000 men.

It is far more intelligent for us to proceed on the basis to set industry to work, as the result of balancing the Budget, than it is to appropriate a paltry sum to provide relief for unemployment. Let us get to the bottom of the situation and the root of the trouble. We have been going along on a false basis of employment of people by the expenditure of public funds, for things and projects that were not absolutely needed, and which we could get along without. We have got to get to the point where we can balance the Budget and stop this sort of thing.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. TABER was given two minutes more.)

Mr. TABER. If we do not balance the Budget and cut out these things that ought to be cut out and ought to be trimmed down, providing we are taking care of those projects which are absolutely necessary in a reasonable way, we are going to get to the point where we will have to cut everything of that kind out entirely.

Why not put our house in order on an intelligent basis, balance the Budget, and cut out enough to help toward putting the country to work? I appeal to the membership of the House to support this amendment and save to the people of the country this amount of money that will be saved as a result of the decreased cost of material and labor that has come along in the last 8 or 10 months. [Applause.]

It costs about $4,900 to put a man to work in rivers and harbors work—the largest amount required in any branch of construction work in the Government. It costs about $2,500 in the building-construction projects in our own districts.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I rise in opposition to this amendment, for this reason: First of all, the original budget that was agreed to by the engineers amounted to $75,000,000. On account of existing conditions it was reduced to $60,000,000. It has been cut as low as you can cut it, unless you want to destroy it.

My judgment is that if you take off this 10 per cent you will lose three times as much as if you left it on. The engineers are prepared over the country to follow the line in accordance with the surveys they have made.

They have the material on the ground and the men; they have the organization. In other words, when the money runs out the organization would have to disperse, the machinery be removed, and laid aside work until we could pass another appropriation.

This is a piece of folly, to talk about cutting an appropriation that will do so much damage to the country at the present time.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not a fact that in projects partly finished if you let them go for a year you would lose more than you would save by this amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes; if you let them lie for a year or two you would lose more than you would save.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not a fact that last year we spent $83,000,000 of it and already labor is going to be laid off to the extent of $23,000,000? This appropriation took the biggest cut of any appropriation. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] pointed out, the majority of this is in labor, either at the river, in the quarry, or in some other place, and if we take $6,000,000 more off on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], it will result in cutting the wages of labor at those points.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Three hundred and fifty thousand labor days.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The real truth of the matter is that 90 per cent of the work is labor. We are talking now about appropriating a couple of billion dollars for the purpose of helping labor. I talked with General Brown just the other day. Four hundred and thirty-one million dollars worth of river and harbor work in this country has been allocated, and if you are going to appropriate money to help labor, that is where it should be used. Ninety per cent of the work is labor. If you are going to do something to help labor, where can you do it better than by going on with this $431,000,000 of projects instead of taking off a measly little $6,000,000?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And if the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is right in his statement that we can get work done for 20 per cent less than we could formerly, is not this the time to take advantage of that very fact?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Exactly so; and we must recognize the fact that we have the best organization in the Engineers' Department that we have ever had. The greatest care is being taken, the greatest effort at reducing expenses is being made, and I say to you that to deliberately step out here and cut this off would be a crime, and I hope nobody will follow the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman discuss briefly the amount of this appropriation that must be allocated to maintenance?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The gentleman from New York did that—$22,000,000 for maintenance, which would give you about $37,000,000 for new work. Think of it. With all of these men who are at work, even taking the gentleman's own figures, you will have to lay them off, and that is all there is to it. There is no sense in the proposition. I am just as much for economy as the gentleman from New York is. I want to balance the Budget just as much as he does, but the real truth of the matter is that this river and harbor work brings something to the Government; you get something for the money that you put out. You are not simply exploiting something; you are putting the money into these projects to bring about better facilities for transportation in the country.

I shall close this talk with just one statement. All of us on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, every member, have worked hard to do what? To bring to the attention of the House only projects that would be essential to the Government. On our committee we do not recommend worthless projects. We look into them, and this amount of money must not be lowered. If it is, you will destroy many of these projects that have been approved by the House of Representatives.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE to the amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 72, line 16, strike out "$59,277,095" and insert "$55,313,240.25."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, of course, we might have and should have responded to the wishes of the people of America and effected some economies in this bill with the military activities. If some of these gentlemen who are so solicitous of the Treasury this morning had been half so solicitous a few days ago, or when our economy program was before them, we might have saved in this bill $24,000,000, which Mr. Hoover is alleged to have said to one or probably two of his spokesmen he would like to have saved in this bill. I would like to see some savings made in this bill.

There is no one on the floor of the House who is more interested in the development of our rivers and harbors work than I am. I have spent some 10 or 12 years studying such problems. I think it is a very important work of the Government and entirely necessary. I recall, however, that during the war our Government stopped the construction of new projects unless they were in the nature of emergencies, though we continued to maintain all projects.

While we are not at war with a foreign enemy, we are at war with economic conditions in this country that are far more serious than they were when we were in actual warfare. A 10 per cent cut is suggested. I shall be glad to insert in the RECORD the effect of that, as stated by General Brown, whom I regard as one of the truly great men of this Nation, together with his letter in which he said that a 10 per cent cut under $60,000,000 will delay to some extent work on projects already adopted, and on new projects, excepting those that are highly essential in the development of the Nation's commerce. I do not think this House is going to cut the amount suggested by the committee by 10 per cent. I have submitted an amendment of 5 per cent for the consideration of the House in lieu of the 10.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Does the gentleman not think that on account of the war and the delay in taking care of these projects we find one of the reasons why we have to make these appropriations now? It was delayed so long that now we are up against it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am not so sure as to that. We have made very good progress in the development of our rivers and harbors. I am sure there are very worthy and essential projects that need development as quickly as possible in keeping with the condition of the Nation's finances. Such work will undoubtedly proceed. Of course, those of us who have studed this work of the Government regret to see the funds decreased, but, gentlemen, these are strenuous days; unhappy days of economic distress. Many activities of the Government must be curtailed, and at a time like this some should be eliminated. We will not, of course, eliminate river and harbor work; but I can not but feel that we are forced to make as much cut as possible on this or any other appropriation item without seriously impairing efficiency and creating lost motion and waste.

As to the employment feature involved, General Brown stated that he figured every $1,500 might be measured by the labor of one employee in this work. If we take those figures, we find that we are not decreasing employment very much by the substitute amendment. I submit if you care to make reductions on this item, if you think it is wise policy, the 5 per cent reduction, in my judgment, will place you on safe ground and certainly prevent serious injury to probably one of the most important public works of the Government. The most important projects will be given attention, though a little less money will be expended on them under a 5 per cent cut.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that General Brown's original estimate of $75,000,000 has already been cut $15,000,000 by the Budget?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Fifteen million dollars. That is doubtless true.

Mr. CULKIN. And is it not a fact that that is the greatest cut that has been made in any appropriation bill in the House?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not know whether it is or not. I know it was suggested in the Economy Committee—and I am almost afraid to mention that committee now—that it could be cut $20,000,000. I did not make the suggestion, but it was made, and I think it came originally from certain gentlemen, speaking the view of those connected with the administration, who thought such a cut was possible without injury. I think $20,000,000 reduction is too much. I do think General Brown's letter can be construed to mean that he could carry on the most essential construction in this work with a further reduction of 5 per cent. I am frank to say I doubt the wisdom of a 10 per cent reduction of this item. I believe General Brown will make this fund go as far as possible with the best results to the taxpayers.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman understands that this item in this bill represents something over $22,000,000 for maintenance?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. And represents work on 300 projects scattered north, south, east, and west?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Well, as for that matter, it means a cut on projects in my own district. Ten per cent would mean a cut of practically one-half million dollars within my immediate territory. This should at least show my good faith in offering an amendment to cut this item. Economy means cuts everywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I understand from the Board of Engineers that with $37,000,000 they will be able to employ 8,000 men, or practically $4,900 per man.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thought the gentleman had a question to ask, but am glad to have his figures. I made no inquiry of the board. I discussed this subject with the Chief of Engineers.

I am the last man on this floor to hinder or impede this very important activity. I am sincere when I say I believe that every essential project, those on the Missouri River, the Illinois, the Great Lakes, the Tennessee, Lake Okeechobee in Florida, and others, while taking a cut—I believe a 5 per cent cut—is not such a reduction as would destroy or greatly impede the activity, nor result in lost motion.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Does the gentleman think it is good economy to stop work that is already being done?

Mr. McDUFFIE. This will not stop work that is already being done; that is, the essential work that is already being done; the work that is absolutely necessary to carry on.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. On what authority does the gentleman say that?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Just the same authority that the gentleman stands on this floor and gives his own authority. I have studied this problem quite as long as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Not any more than I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert the letter from General Brown, setting out what the situation will be, in his judgment, in the event of a 10 per cent cut.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. You will note that General Brown's estimate and suggestions are based on a 10 per cent cut, while I am offering only a 5 per cent cut, leaving $56,313,000 in round numbers for the work for 1933. I feel sure this committee will not accept a 10 per cent cut, and possibly you will make no cut at all, yet I feel this is a plan where we can save two or three million without serious injury.

The letter and figures of General Brown follow:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, May 6, 1932.

Hon. JOHN MCDUFFIE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCDUFFIE: In accordance with your request I have carefully gone over the work planned by this department during the fiscal year 1933, with a view to determining the projects that would be affected by a reduction in the appropriation for river and harbor works from $60,000,000 to $50,000,000.

The Budget estimate of $60,000,000 was attained by the elimination of all work on projects authorized by Congress but not yet begun, except certain projects of especial importance to commerce and navigation on which operations have not been undertaken because of the delay in meeting conditions of local cooperation, in the furnishing of lands, etc., the fulfillment of which is to be anticipated. A further reduction will entail the postponement of all work except that of the highest importance for commerce and navigation, for most of which continuing contracts have been or are being entered into. I inclose a list showing the reductions necessary in the allocations presented to the Subcommittee on Appropriations which would be necessary if the appropriation were reduced from $60,000,000 to $50,000,000.

Sincerely yours,

LYTLE BROWN,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

(One inclosure.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have devoted many, many weeks of arduous labor during the present session in trying to bring about a reduction in Government expenditures and a decrease in appropriation bills; but I do not believe this is the place in this bill to make a cut. There are other cuts which can be made and to which I will direct attention presently.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether this Congress realizes the condition which confronts this country. I doubt whether we appreciate the gravity of it. Hunger, want, and unemployment prevail everywhere. Here is an amendment which proposes to cut the number of people employed. We have heard about a dole, and we hear about relief measures pending in the Senate and in the House, and it is said that before we adjourn this Congress we must do something to relieve these suffering people. I would infinitely more prefer to appropriate money here and let those people exchange labor and material for money, rather than give them a dole, a gratuity. That is what this amendment would do.

I said there were other cuts which could be made in this bill; and when we get back in the House, I hope they will be made. I refer to the citizens' military and Officers' Reserve Corps summer training camps. Under the bill as reported the citizens' military camps would be suspended one year and the Officers' Reserve Corps would be permitted to have the summer camp with all expenses paid but would draw no salary while there. These provisions as to the camps would apply for one year only.

Now, we did not go at this matter in a haphazard way in the preparation of this bill. We did not make these cuts arbitrarily. I shall tell you something that was said to me during the preparation of this bill. There was a high-up Army officer called to see me. He was not a dissatisfied officer. He was not one who had a grudge against the General Staff, but he was full-fledged. In other words, he was "in the swim," and he sought to elicit information from me as to what we might do in the preparation and reporting of this bill. I said, "We want to effect some economies if possible." He said, "Now, if you want to know where some real economies can be made that will not affect or impair the efficiency of national defense in the United States, I would be glad to inform you secretly where they could be made."

I said: "You are the man I am looking for."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman did not ask that high Army officer to appear before the subcommittee and give the entire subcommittee and the membership of the House the benefit of that information by printing his statement in the hearings. Why did he not give it openly rather than secretly?

Mr. WRIGHT. I gave it to the committee.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is not in the hearings.

Mr. WRIGHT. The committee got the information. I am not going to disclose the officer's name here to-day because I promised I would not.

Mr. BYRNS. What does the gentleman think would happen to him?

Mr. WRIGHT. Many things might happen to him. He furnished me information, and I promised to protect him.

Mr. JAMES. What would happen to an officer who gave the committee such information in the open?

Mr. WRIGHT. I imagine he would not be promoted.

The next day he brought me a list, all of which I will not read. He said: "Suspend the national rifle matches for one year and save half a million dollars; suspend for one year the citizens' military training camps and thereby save over two and one-half million dollars." He said: "So far as the Reserve Officers' Corps is concerned save over $2,000,000 there by cutting out the ten thousand 14-day trainees," and that we acted upon.

These suggestions are brought to the House on the recommendation of a high Army officer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BALDRIGE. What was the name of the Army officer?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will not tell the gentleman. I would suffer my right arm to be severed from my body before I would tell, because I promised the officer I would not divulge his name.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The appropriation was cut $15,000,000 upon suggestions made by the Chief of Engineers, was it not?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes. The Bureau of the Budget cut the estimate from $75,000,000 to $60,000,000, and the committee adopted the Budget estimate.

Mr. CULKIN. It has been cut $15,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. It has been cut $15,000,000.

This morning's mail brings me a letter from a reserve officer of high rank, a major. I am not going to read all of the letter, for I will not have time. I shall read only one or two sentences:

> First, let me say that any reserve officer who is not willing to go to camp for actual transportation and subsistence is not worthy of holding a commission in the Army of the United States.

Further, he says:

> For myself, I can not say that I am entitled to go to camp this summer, but I have qualified for the command and General Staff School at Leavenworth, and although it is great disappointment to me to miss it, I can honestly say that any reserve officer who is not willing to cut down expenses at this time is not sincere in his supposed patriotism.

Mr. GOSS and Mr. MARTIN of Oregon rose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will yield to one gentleman, but I can not yield to two.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. What kind of a man do you think it is who will not let his name be published in connection with information he furnishes?

Mr. WRIGHT. I expect things came up while the gentleman from Oregon was in the Army in connection with which he did not want his name to be given.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Any scalawag who will not let his name be used——

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman is going to call this man a scalawag, he might have to meet him face to face.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is all right. The gentleman should divulge his name.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not going to divulge his name, because I told him I would not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed both to the substitute and to the original motion.

We have not time to discuss the effect upon all the waterways of this country such a proposition would have. I shall not refer to the Tennessee River, nor to the Mississippi River, nor to the Missouri River, nor to the port of Baltimore, and the other major ports that are vitally interested in the appropriation carried in the bill at this time. I will simply refer to one case, that of the Great Lakes. The rivers and harbors bill of 1930 carried a provision authorizing $24,000,000 for the deepening of the connecting channels of the Great Lakes. The division engineer at Cleveland, Colonel Markham, informed me day before yesterday that if the work could be prosecuted now without delay, it could be done for far less than $20,000,000, and result in a saving of some six or seven millions of dollars to the Government under the estimate made in 1929.

Furthermore, the boats are idle upon the Great Lakes this summer, as I am reliably informed. They do not expect to carry more than 12,000,000 tons the present year, when they usually carry 130,000,000 tons. The boats are tied up in Cleveland and in all the ports on the Great Lakes. The connecting channels are virtually idle, and now, above all times, he informs me, perhaps a double amount of work could be done in a given time than could be done when all those boats are in operation. [Applause.]

Let me give you an instance by illustration. By actual demonstration it has been found that some five years ago at a point in the Detroit River, three boats passed a given point, going in one direction or the other, every two minutes. Just think of that, gentlemen. And when you come to the channels between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, with the locks in operation and boats constantly going through them, with several hundred boats passing there in a day's time, when could they do the work better than they can at this time, when those boats are idle? It would result in the saving of many millions of dollars to this Government by prosecuting the work at this time, with the least possible interference with business. It would be no interference with the great steel industry, because they tell me they expect to operate for 30 months on the ore they now have, and it is hoped that before the expiration of that time all these connecting channels will be completed and that then business, if it revives, can push along perhaps as never before in our history. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. While I disagree with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], I can certainly understand the provocation which prompted his offering that amendment. Why, the Committee on Appropriations came out with a real constructive bill effecting substantial economies. We have stood on this floor and seen this bill torn to pieces and about $8,000,000 to $9,000,000 added to it.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I am sorry.

I can understand how some of the gentlemen are seeking an alibi in order to offset what they have added to this bill. [Applause.]

I have given you figures showing the number of labor days on each million dollars. I obtained those figures from the office of the Chief of Engineers. Those figures show 60,000 labor days for every million dollars appropriated for river and harbor work and 77,000 labor days for every million dollars for flood-control work. But if that does not impress you, permit me to talk to my colleagues over here. President Hoover, on March 14, 1932, sent a special message asking an immediate appropriation for river and harbor works. He asked for $60,000,000 and stated:

> As delay seems inevitable and unless some action be taken, a large number of men will be thrown out of work and other expenses incurred by suspension of work.

Here is the entire message:

[House of Representatives, Document No. 272, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

IMMEDIATE APPROPRIATION FOR RIVER AND HARBOR WORKS

Communication from the President of the United States, transmitting request that the Congress give consideration to immediate appropriation of the funds for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works in order that we may avoid the unemployment and dislocation which will rise from such delay.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 14, 1932.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: It appears that the regular War Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1933 will be delayed beyond the usual time. The Budget estimate for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works for 1933 is $60,000,000, which would become immediately available upon the passage of the act. I am now advised by the Secretary of War that, depending upon the usual course of appropriations, the engineers have entered upon certain contracts, the continuance of which have depended upon the passage of the appropriation at the usual time. As delay seems inevitable and unless some action be taken, a large number of men will be thrown out of work and other expenses incurred by suspension of work. I therefore recommend that the Congress give consideration to immediate appropriation of the funds for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works in order that we may avoid the unemployment and dislocation which will arise from such delays. Such a course would imply no increase in the contemplated expenditures.

I inclose herewith the recommendations of the Director of the Budget.

Respectfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, March 14, 1932.

SIR: The Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, on page 596, contains an estimate of appropriation of $60,000,000 for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works, as follows:

"RIVERS AND HARBORS

"To be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers:

"Maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works: For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation; for survey of northern and northwestern lakes and other boundary and connecting waters as heretofore authorized, including the preparation, correction, printing, and issuing of charts and bulletins and the investigation of lake levels; for prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City; for expenses of the California Débris Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act approved March 1, 1893 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 661); and for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors: Provided, That no funds shall be expended for any preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate not authorized by law, $60,000,000 (U. S. C., title 33, secs. 541, 622, 661; act Feb. 23, 1931, vol. 46, p. 1306)."

The Secretary of War advises as follows:

"The department has been actively prosecuting river and harbor work with funds heretofore appropriated. It was considered in the public interest to press the work during the past winter season in the interest of the unemployment situation, and to advance the work under present favorable conditions of prices. It is prepared to undertake the vigorous prosecution of the work during the summer season now approaching. Anticipating the passage of the War Department appropriation before April of this year, contracts contingent upon this appropriation have been entered into and the contractors have engaged labor and material to proceed with the work.

"The funds from prior appropriations available for this work are, however, so reduced that it will soon be necessary to suspend operations on many important projects and lay off a considerable force of men unless additional funds are soon appropriated. It is the understanding of this department that the passage of the War Department appropriation act for the coming fiscal year is not to be anticipated for some time."

In view of the conditions set forth by the Secretary of War, it is recommended that this matter be brought to the attention of Congress, with request that the estimate of $60,000,000 contained in the Budget for the fiscal year 1933, for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works, be given special consideration at this time with a view to having river and harbor funds made available at an early date.

Very respectfully,

J. CLAWSON ROOP,
Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

The PRESIDENT.

Now, are you going to stand by the President? There can be no doubt in this instance as to what the President said, because I have it here in writing. [Applause.]

Now, I want to ask my colleague from New York how he can possibly stand up here and urge his amendment in the face of this message asking that this appropriation be made immediately available by reason of the emergency character of the work involved?

Gentlemen, this House is going to take action within a very few days on a gigantic measure which will bring employment to several million people. Only a few minutes ago the distinguished Speaker of this House issued a statement to the whole country stating that he approved and would sponsor—and I know the House will follow him—legislation increasing by a billion dollars the amount now made available for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I tell you the country is going to respond to this leadership of the Speaker of the House. The Speaker's statement is statesmanlike, and it is very generous in that he offers to place in the hands of the President of the United States $100,000,000. In addition to that, he recommends another billion dollars for public works. He outlines the details of this program; and I invite every Member of this House to study carefully the Garner plan, which was made public only a few minutes ago. [Applause.]

Now, then, can we, in the face of this, stand for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama? I say that in view of the fact that we are going to authorize loans to States, to subdivisions thereof, and loans to semipublic corporations, all in an effort to create work and to stimulate industry in order to save the country. We are now on the eve of a complete collapse, and something drastic must be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert at this point the encouraging and timely statement made by Speaker GARNER of the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

Ever since Congress met in December it has been discussing and undertaking to pass legislation that would be helpful in relieving the present distressing economic conditions. Some far-reaching legislation has been placed upon the statute books. I have been hopeful that these legislative efforts would tend to bring about better conditions, but the facts are that the unemployment and distress of the people are greater now than when Congress was organized last December.

I am unalterably opposed to the dole, but it must be apparent that before Congress adjourns some real effort must be made toward taking care of the unemployment situation as well as the people who are in physical distress as a result of lack of food and raiment.

It is evident that the situation can not be remedied by international negotiations to remove barriers and restrictions upon international commerce, since the present administration will not permit legislation of this nature. Therefore we must consider what, if anything, can be done to improve the situation by direct action of the Government. To that end I have three suggestions to offer, and I sincerely hope that the administration will consider them and cooperate with the Congress in their enactment into legislation:

First. I would pass what is known as the Huddleston bill, which has for its purpose the placing in the hands of the President $100,000,000 to be used as he deems necessary to relieve extreme suffering in any section of the country. If it is not necessary to use it, of course it will not be used. This is in accord with the action of the Congress in 1898, when it placed in the hands of President McKinley, as well as the commanding general of the Army in the Philippines, $100,000,000 to be expended as his judgment might deem advisable in the defense of the country. Likewise, in 1917, $100,000,000 were placed at the disposal of President Wilson for similar purposes. It has been said, with some degree of truth, that the present condition is more distressing to the people of this Nation than in either 1898 or 1917, and surely we can trust the President to use the $100,000,000 patriotically and wisely for the purpose intended.

Second. I would broaden the base of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, permit it to exercise its judgment in making loans without any restriction whatever, and add $1,000,000,000 to its authorized issue, making the total three billion instead of two, as at present. This would enable that corporation to loan funds to States, counties, and cities where legal and adequate security could be offered. It would also permit that corporation to exercise its good judgment in making loans to individuals or corporations where adequate security is offered and where it is assured that labor would be employed.

The principal purpose of the original reconstruction act was twofold—to sustain credit of banks and corporations and to loan money to industrial corporations, such as railways, for the employment of additional labor. There has been little or none of the second purpose brought about. The principal activities of the corporation up to this time have been to sustain the credit of banks and other corporate interests by taking their frozen assets and making them loans upon the same which could not be had otherwise; and in loaning money to railway corporations largely for the purpose of paying interest and maturing obligations. We surely can trust the present board to administer wisely the additional duties as they are administering the present limited duties.

Third. I would provide for the issuance of a billion dollars' worth of bonds for the purpose of a governmental building program, based largely upon laws already passed by Congress and approved by the President. In order that there might be no infringing upon the present Budget obligation, I would levy a tax at the same time to take care of the interest and sinking fund. This procedure would be economically sound and would give considerable employment to labor in the different sections of the country and make provisions for governmental activities which must be had, under any conditions, in the near future.

Of course, the first question asked under the third suggestion would probably be "What taxes would you levy?" I have not tried to make a survey with the view of offering suggestions, but, speaking for myself only, I would levy one-third of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline. Of course, this and other taxes of similar nature would be repealed as soon as conditions improve to the point where our revenue from income, inheritance, and corporation taxes would meet our expenditures.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] says that in his opinion the Chief of Engineers can go along with the projects that have been laid out. I would like to know when the gentleman from New York qualified as an expert civil engineer and where he gets his information that the Chief of Engineers can go along just the same with a reduction in the appropriation?

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman read the daily newspapers and keep track of the prices of material and labor that have been going down and have resulted in tremendous profits to the contractors who have taken Government work?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The Chief of Engineers of the United States Army is going to get a reasonable bid from a contractor, and he will take into consideration the prevailing price of material as well as the prevailing wage scale, as well as any other outstanding features that enter into the proposal, and it has always been his policy to do the work if he does not get a reasonable bid or one that is within his estimate. The engineers have handled numerous projects just because the contractors would not come within the estimates.

Mr. TABER. And the bids are going to be a great deal lower than they were a year ago.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If so, the work will progress faster. That is what we want. We want the job completed. The sooner the better. In fact, it would be better to complete the work in a year or two rather than over a period of years. It must be done.

I am in favor of balancing the Budget, but I am not going to vote to balance the Budget at the expense of the laboring people of this country. [Applause.] It is far more important, as I said the other day when the Muscle Shoals bill was pending, to place the people of this country at work than to balance the Budget. We can balance the Budget and still provide work for the unemployed.

Your Secretary of the Treasury, in a speech on December 14, in New York, placed in the RECORD the following day by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], stated that it is folly to assume that the issuance of $2,000,000,000 or more of bonds would in any way impair the credit of this country.

I say to you, as was stated before, that you are going to vote on legislation that will be beneficial to the millions out of work before we adjourn, and you are going to vote for it, and you will probably appropriate more money for rivers and harbors work than is carried in this bill. You must lead the way to meet the unemployment situation.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not a fact that the Chief of Engineers eliminated from the program everything except what is regarded as absolutely essential?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have no direct information as to what the Chief of Engineers has eliminated. I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do not the hearings show that?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Probably so. I hope the Chief of Engineers will go ahead with this public work that will give employment to some of the 8,000,000 men now out of work.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has it not been shown that these activities are not only essential activities of the Government from the standpoint of economy in moving the great commerce of this country but that these activities are giving employment to the people at the lowest possible cost to the Government?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely. Here is an opportunity to complete work that you are eventually going to complete, and you can complete it for less money than you will be able to finish the job if you wait several years. Why not take advantage of the situation and go ahead with the projects that have been surveyed and authorized? Some of them are half completed. Some of them are almost completed. The engineers are ready to go, and they are waiting for this money, as the President stated in his recent message when he asked for $60,000,000. The President urged an immediate appropriation.

I am sorry the Committee on Appropriations did not bring out a resolution appropriating the money that the President asked for, because it would mean that men would go to work immediately, and not have to wait until July 1.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that both amendments will be voted down. There are other ways to economize without stopping public improvements or at the expense of the unemployed.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a brief article upon the subject which I have just discussed.

Mr. Chairman, I submit the following editorial from the St. Louis Star of May 16:

FOURTEEN FRONTS

Speaker GARNER states nothing but the bald truth when he says Mr. Hoover has done more to freeze public confidence than anybody else in the country. The President's daily statements have been an advertisement of his bewilderment. He said last January that fighting a depression was like a great war, "not a battle upon a single front but upon many fronts," yet all the time he has been fighting a rear-guard action upon a single front—that of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The St. Louis Star pointed this out when Mr. Hoover addressed Congress last January. Recognizing that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was needed to support railroad credit and to relieve pressure on insurance companies and banks, the Star then said:

"Is this measure calculated to increase freight tonnage, which is the one great need of the railroads? Not at all. It is simply to reduce the financial consequences of lack of business. It is a binding up of wounds, a trying to catch up with what has already happened. * * * What is lacking in Mr. Hoover's outlook? One trouble seems to be that, appealing to the country to dismiss its illogical fears, he has more fears than anybody else. He fears inflation of the public debt, hence will not consent to a public-works program that would vitalize a hundred lines of industry. * * * He fears the tariff overlords of the Republican Party. * * * He will not move against the 12-hour day and child labor in southern textile mills. * * * Nor will he move against conditions that are ruining both miner and operator in the coal industry. Controlled production in demoralized industries for the common benefit of capital, labor, and the public is beyond Mr. Hoover's ken."

Whenever anybody proposes a general plan of action Mr. Hoover calls it a panacea and says panaceas won't work. Of course they won't. But what is a panacea? It is a single remedy for all disease. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, valuable within its limits, was Mr. Hoover's panacea, and it failed to work a cure. So, too, the bond issue for public works, to which the President has been driven by political and economic compulsion, will fail if it stands alone.

If the battle must be fought on "many fronts," let's have a list of them. Here are 14:

1. Issue bonds for a broad program of public works, including the wiping out of slum districts through loans to be amortized in rents.

2. Continue the forcible inflation of credit and currency through the Federal reserve, keeping in mind that this will not restore business and prices except as an aid to a trend already in progress.

3. Compel the spread of employment by shortening hours sufficiently to absorb the population rendered idle by labor-saving machinery. Do this through Federal power over interstate commerce or through corporation income tax graduations.

4. Resubmit the child labor law to the United States Supreme Court, recognizing that the court's decision in the Indiana chain-store case was a reversal of the doctrine on which the 1922 child-labor decision was based. End the demoralization of interstate commerce by unscrupulous producers in backward States.

5. Repeal the antitrust laws, substituting automatic regulation of business through an excess-profits tax coupled with Federal supervision over issuance of stocks and bonds, thus helping business to a reasonable profit and directing part of the excess profits into the pockets of labor.

6. Force a reorganization of the coal and oil industries to make them profitable for their owners, raise the purchasing power of their employees, and conserve natural resources in which the people have a supreme stake.

7. Give the Interstate Commerce Commission the same authority over truck, bus, and river transportation that it has over the railroads, and do it before the trucking of freight at cut-throat prices bankrupts the railroads.

8. Repeal the railroad earnings recapture law, leaving railroads subject to an excess-profits tax.

9. Write the words of the sixteenth amendment, "From whatever sources received," into the income tax law, thus ending evasion of the income surtax through tax-exempt securities. The Supreme Court virtually invited Congress to do this, in the California franchise-tax opinion last month.

10. Raise income surtaxes, inheritance and gift taxes high enough to aid in the redistribution of wealth and enable the masses of the people to buy the products of industry and share in its ownership.

11. Vastly extend the reforestation of marginal farm lands both for timber benefits and to reduce the agricultural surplus which depresses farm prices. Stop reclamation of swamp and desert land; stop overgrazing on the national domain.

12. Cooperate with the rest of the world in getting rid of the reparations and war-debt deadlock, now paralyzing world recovery. Collect whatever can be absorbed in additional imports, the only form of international payment possible.

13. Make a start toward lowering of tariff barriers, recognizing that the "most-favored-nation" principle has been destroyed by customs unions and import quotas.

14. Call a world monetary conference to deal with the loss of silver's buying power.

Mr. Chairman, regardless as to whether we agree with all the suggestions in the editorial from the St. Louis Star, it must be conceded that the writer seeks at least to offer what he feels are constructive suggestions to meet the situation that confronts not only the Congress and the administration but the entire country. While we are chosen to write the laws of the country, still there is a duty that every citizen owes his country, and that duty, as I see it, now calls for the cooperation of all citizens in the effort being made to overcome the depression that has had a grip on our Nation for several years.

The editorial, in part, suggests the raising of income taxes, surtaxes, inheritance and gift taxes high enough to aid in the redistribution of wealth and enable the masses of the people to buy the products of industry and share in its ownership.

I am frank to say I voted for the increases in income, inheritance, and gift taxes carried in the revenue bill as it passed the House. In doing so I felt that I should consider the question of ability to pay. Considering conditions, the suggested rates were not confiscatory. For that vote I have been criticized.

I realize there are few rich men left in comparison with those who were fortunate enough to possess large sums and who earned large incomes prior to 1929. There was no thought in my mind to deal unfairly with the rich, other than one class, and that class was our citizens who had accumulated large fortunes in this country and who have sent over $3,000,000,000 abroad for investment in factories in foreign countries, where there are now being manufactured by cheap labor, the articles that were formerly manufactured in this country and shipped abroad. As the result of investing this vast sum of money abroad our foreign trade has been greatly reduced; in fact, aided by the tariff, the foreign trade of this country faces destruction. And that is not all. We read where other Americans are seeking sites for factories, Lord Derby stating in a recent speech that some 25 American corporations would soon be erecting factories in England. The shoe industry of my city, St. Louis, I am sure realizes that it must meet the competition of foreign factories erected with American money. Of course, a man has the right to invest his money as he sees fit, but is it not reasonable to feel that Americans should have some thought for their own country and their fellow citizens?

I spoke in favor of and in every way aided the efforts to adopt an amendment that would have denied certain deductions to Americans who had made large investments, not in securities, but in factories in foreign countries. I have no apology to offer for that.

One of the letters I received criticizing the Congress for raising the income, surtaxes, inheritance, and gift taxes came from a well-known attorney of my city whose specialty is handling income and estate tax cases before the Internal Revenue Bureau. He wrote, in part:

> Of course, those who do not care to pay the taxes will find the means of avoiding; but resort to such means is also destructive, because money is placed in trust or other inactive holding and withdrawn from business credits.

In speaking of the tax on stock transfers he said:

> The proposed tax upon stock transfers is about the most destructive proposition that I can conceive. Of course, the business of dealers in securities is already very precarious, but I am not thinking of them.
> Moreover, such a tax is so easy to avoid that if it becomes high enough to justify the effort the tax will not be collected. For instance, there is at present under consideration a plan, if this tax is imposed, of organizing corporations in other countries, say, Canada, which will be merely holding agents.

Mark you, he says a plan is already under consideration. The tax has not as yet been imposed.

He then proceeded to advise me at length how this would work, and added that this was only one of several schemes that could be resorted to to evade taxes.

I had been engaged for weeks with the Economy Committee, working day and night, and when I came to my office one evening and found that letter I became rather irritated, especially when the thought came to me that the writer was one who would probably be in a position to show the taxpayer how to evade the tax, owing to the fact that he could be classed as an expert in tax matters.

I do not say that he would show citizens how to evade the tax, for I have no information that would warrant me to say that he is anything but an honorable man.

I hastily dictated a response. I told the gentleman that I had voted for the taxes of which he complained. I further stated that the time had come when there must be a redistribution of the wealth of the country. I did, however, fail to further explain my view in regard to the redistribution of wealth. This left my communication open to criticism. It could be construed in many ways—in fact, in any way the reader desired to construe it. One could say I favored by force or by most radical legislation depriving those who possessed wealth of their just holdings.

Mr. Chairman, the mere mention of redistribution of wealth causes many to shudder, to become astonished. The thought is misconstrued. There is no desire upon the part of anyone who has offered such a suggestion to boldly scatter among the many the holdings of a few. The real thought as I understand it is that there should be a less inequitable distribution of wealth and income.

Even had Congress adopted the higher income and estate taxes, the wealthy and their children still would have retained the bulk of great fortunes and there is no desire to deny them to maintain and distribute among their heirs the greater part of their holdings. Compare, if you please, the laws of Great Britain and other foreign countries in this respect with the laws of the United States. There is no comparison. The rates abroad are far greater than ours. There is a strong feeling that in these present times the very wealthy, however, should not be willing to pile up higher surpluses while millions are in want.

Mr. Chairman, I have no thought other than that expressed in the Constitution, which grants to our citizens the right to enjoy the fruits of their own labor. However, there are citizens who possess great wealth who have, by the creation of trust funds, and investments in tax-exempt securities, not only failed to do their just share toward meeting the expenses of the Government but, on the contrary, have found legal ways to evade the intent of our legislative bodies and escaped taxation, thus placing additional burdens upon others who possess wealth, and who have invested their money in business so as to provide work for their fellow man. It is this class that has evaded taxation I would reach, either by amendment to the Constitution or by legislation if possible, so that in the end the burden of meeting the taxes would be more equitably distributed than at present.

I favor protecting the rights of the man who has money and who is being pinched to meet his tax assessments and who meets the assessments. It is this class of our citizens that I seek to benefit as well as the masses of the people in my effort to find a way to require those who have hoarded their money in such a manner as to make it practically impossible for the Government and the States to reach. If this is not done, then I predict that these swollen fortunes will continue to increase; and if this prediction be correct, then where and how will the Government, national State, and cities secure the revenue that is necessary to carry on? It is unfair, in my opinion, to require those who have their fortunes invested in business to carry all the burden while part of it should be met by others whose income can be classed as unearned income. Would we not be able to in part redistribute the wealth of this class if we can find a way to tax their holdings?

Many trust funds created by immensely wealthy people at the time of their death are practically perepetual. Some provide for their continuance until there is no issue, which will mean a hundred years or more in some cases.

Considering our method of raising revenue up to 20 or 25 years ago, naturally it does appear to some that the rates applied by the House bill as well as the bill reported by the Senate border on confiscation, and those who take this view complain bitterly. I had a telegram from one of our outstanding business men who classed it as sheer communism.

We resorted during the war to methods unheard of prior thereto in our effort to raise revenue. There was no complaint, because we were at war, fighting for our very existence. At the conclusion of the war our country found itself burdened with billions of debts which, of course, must be paid. European nations owed us billions, and we have found it necessary not only to reduce those debts but now find it impossible even to collect the interest. There was no objection to the President's declaration for a moratorium. The business man did not realize then that he would be called upon to meet expenditures that had previously been taken care of by applying the money we received annually from the foreign countries. He is now awake to that fact.

We are faced with another war—a war against a depression that threatens our existence. Never in our history have we in peace time been confronted with such a critical situation. It is this fact that requires the raising of additional money, that requires the passage of legislation that would not be given serious thought if conditions were normal. We are accused of being radicals, and what not. There are various schools of thought offering suggestions as to how we can best meet conditions that confront us.

Members of Congress are not radicals when they express themselves and demand that those who have ability to pay should be taxed.

With eight to ten millions of our citizens out of work, as many more working part time, and some thirty or forty millions of our population depending upon those people for food and shelter, methods must be resorted to that of course will be resented by many. They are unusual but conditions require the action.

When conditions were normal the business man did not complain, in fact he urged the Congress to enact legislation that called for expansion, the creation of bureaus and commissions, that resulted in mounting expenditures, but now he demands that overnight all the activities that he helped to create be destroyed, and his criticism is critical.

Getting back to the communication I received from the attorney, I further stated in my letter, referring to the attorney's statement that ways would be found to evade the taxes, that I was not disturbed by such a threat and that such a threat would in no way affect my decision. I added that it would be for the better if those assessed would willingly meet the assessment, for if they did not Congress would find a way to relieve them of their holdings. By that I meant that Congress would provide ways and means for the collection of the revenue if existing laws were not sufficient. The man who now deliberately and fraudulently defeats the tax laws, if discovered in the end, is required to pay heavy penalties, additional assessments, and interest that rises to amounts that are practically confiscatory, and, further than that, many are sent to prison for tax evasions. That law is now on the statute books, and it is true that many men have practically been relieved of all their holdings who have been found to be deliberately evading the taxes. To my personal knowledge nearly 1,500 such cases are now pending and under investigation by the Treasury Department. The attorney who wrote me is well aware of this fact. The Economy Committtee was advised if it would give the intelligence division more money for additional agents millions due the Government could be collected.

There is a demand from leading economists, from leaders in world affairs, representative groups, including the clergy, as well as the great newspapers of the country, for a change—a change from conditions which they claim have brought us to our knees. Can they all be wrong? Time alone will tell.

This is no period to excite the masses, but, on the contrary, we should all strive regardless of our own welfare to bring about a change for the better.

Concluding, Mr. Chairman, I submit that what we need in this country at this time is confidence. Fear and despair have been handed out to the general public, where those in command of our country and its institutions should be assuming the opposite attitude. The people have become fearful of the future, have hoarded their money when it should be at work. Idle money makes for bad times. Many statements have been made concerning money that is being hoarded. There is no doubt but that several billion dollars in this country is idle at this moment. In an effort to get some information along this line, something upon which one might be able to offer definite statistics, I wrote the Secretary of the Treasury for information relative to the amount of old—large—currency that was still outstanding and had never been offered for redemption. You rarely ever see any old money these days, still the Treasury Department advises me that $538,496,159 of old currency is still outstanding. It is not in circulation, because the minute it reaches a bank it would be sent to the Treasury for redemption.

On top of this there are $39,993,670 in Government securities which have ceased to draw interest still outstanding, never submitted to the department for redemption. The department letter in reply to mine follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 21, 1932.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For the Secretary, and in reply to your letter of May 18, 1932, the following information is furnished.

The amount of old-series (large-size) currency outstanding on April 30, 1932, was as follows:

United States notes	$41,775,856
Silver certificates	45,679,816
Gold certificates	151,346,829
Treasury notes of 1890	1,224,800

Very truly yours,

A. A. BALLANTINE,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives, United States.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, years ago, for days at a time, I held up annually several river and harbor bills, and did it successfully, with the aid of Senators at the other end of the Capitol. We stopped some of these wasteful projects. When I spoke to those leading on my side of the aisle the other day, after I had been asked to do so, and inquired if they wanted me to talk upon this item, they said yes, and I asked when. They answered, when the $60,000,000 paragraph comes up. There are 400 projects involved here in one paragraph, and only a few minutes to discuss them.

I agree with what has been said about unemployment. I have introduced unemployment-aid bills, but by far the greater part of this $60,000,000 river and harbor expenditure goes to contractors and dredgers. I have been over many projects in this bill, including several down in Texas, extending to Freeport, traveling with the father of the gentleman from Texas who has just spoken—a very able man, by the way, as was his father—and I have been over many waterway projects throughout this country. I live alongside the Mississippi River. I have one harbor in my State that is the second largest harbor in the United States. Its total cost to the Government is less than 5 per cent of the cost of the Ohio and other single rivers I could name. It had 45,000,000 tons of commerce in 1930, more than the Mississippi, the Missouri, and Ohio Rivers put together—yes; ten times more actual commerce is carried by the Superior-Duluth port, because most of the commerce on these rivers reported by engineers is sand and gravel, except on the Ohio River, where $150,000,000 of Government money has been spent and only comparatively little coal and steel are carried. In these days of stress and heavy tax burdens it is wasteful beyond measure to appropriate $60,000,000 for such rivers and harbors.

There is not now a ghost of a chance for Members to pass a reduction amendment. I am not talking with that belief, but to call attention to disciples of economy who frantically seek to shave a few dollars from questionable savings and then eagerly vote for this great pork barrel. Every man that is interested in any project is here. The entire Committee on Rivers and Harbors, composed of 21 Members, is here, I assume, or very nearly all, and they will vote for every provision in the bill, good, bad, and indifferent. So, too, with a hundred Members who would be ready to oppose many "projects" if singly presented but will not dare to oppose a bill that carries their own project.

I am just calling your attention to these things because you are entitled to know about them, and the country should know the pork barrel is again here. On page 120 of the hearings you will find that 150 projects have been recommended for abandonment by the engineers of the Army, whom you praise so highly, and the committee has not abandoned one of them.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. I wish I could do so, but I have only a few minutes. On these projects, recommended for abandonment by the Army engineers, you are appropriating money to-day that is being used by the Army engineers.

Mr. MANSFIELD. No.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I have called your attention to it and I will read the data into my speech. It is in the hearings, and the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] asked the questions, and the cost is from $10 to $12 a ton for the Government to float a two-foot draft boat on this one creek.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We are appropriating now in lump sums.

Mr. FREAR. You are appropriating in lump sums, but the engineers use it on these projects recommended for abandonment that the committee will not abandon. I read from page 130 of the hearings:

General PILLSBURY. While some of these projects were recommended for abandonment, they have not been abandoned by Congress, and as long as there is navigation we feel this incumbent to maintain the channel.

Mr. BARBOUR. And there was a little over a thousand tons handled on that river last year (Chipola River, Fla.).

General PILLSBURY. The commerce amounted to 1,649 tons.

Mr. BARBOUR. That would mean at the rate of about $10 or $12 a ton on the river?

General PILLSBURY. Yes; about $10 or $12 a ton (resin carried 16 miles, p. 525, vol. 2, Engineers' Report, 1931).

You will find $6,600,000 is carried in this bill for the Missouri River that was also reported against by the Army Engineers. You can not find an Army engineer in the country that ever recommended the Missouri River for improvement. It is a land reclamation scheme that will cost the Government $80,000,000 on the Missouri, according to the reports, without any local contribution. It was put in by a distinguished Senator over on the other side of the Capitol, because I was before the Senate committee at that time. He held up the river and harbor bill until he got the Missouri River included. It was a tribute to his power, but does not carry any real commerce and is never likely to do so. That is going to cost the Government $89,000,000 for this commerceless river before completion, and is for reclamation rather than for any commerce now or hereafter.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have not the time, I regret, but will say there is an appropriation of $4,900,000 which goes to the Illinois River for the gentleman from Illinois now speaking, where there is no commerce at all and never likely to be after $11,000,000 is spent. You talk for it day after day, and your project is much like the useless Hennepin Canal. Four million nine hundred thousand dollars, as an adjunct to the Chicago drainage canal, and you object to cutting anything out of this bill. It is, in my judgment, one of the most wasteful items carried by this $60,000,000 paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I regret I can not yield. My time is too limited. Four million nine hundred thousand dollars—why is the Illinois gentleman here defending the bill, I ask? American taxpayers are paying $11,000,000 for this Illinois River project. That is the trouble. With these projects in the bill you will all unite against any amendment to reduce the $60,000,000 pork barrel. If left alone, not one project in four, I submit, could get past the House, but put into a pork barrel, you can not get away from it, for all are included, good, bad, and indifferent.

Nearly $50,000,000 is going to be put by the Government into a 200-mile project on the Mississippi River, 200 miles between the mouth of the Ohio and the Illinois rivers. There is no commerce there to justify 1 per cent of that amount, for we are lining the bottom with silver dollars at $250,000 per mile on this 200-mile stretch for only a few tons of real commerce.

A Member living near this project said to me the other day, "Why, FREAR, you are right on these projects. You always were." I know the situation, and believe it will be impossible to change it, but I am telling the House what you are passing in this $60,000,000 item. It should be reduced 10 per cent according to the amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin makes the statement that a large amount of money is going to be spent on projects that have been abandoned by the engineers. That was not the testimony before the committee.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I made no such statement. I said there was money being spent on abandoned projects. I did not say a "large amount."

Mr. CLAGUE. The Chief of Engineers said no money was going to be spent on abandoned projects.

Mr. FREAR. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. McDUFFIE. There is no money being spent on abandoned projects.

Mr. CLAGUE. I know of no money being spent on abandoned projects. I heard the testimony of the engineers before the committee on several occasions.

Now, the Budget estimate cut $15,000,000 from amount recommended by the engineers, therefore this appropriation has been cut to the bone. The President of the United States, two or three years ago, in a statement he gave out, said that these river channels should be completed for operation in about eight years. That was the intention of the Chief of Engineers. They have passed on these river projects and say that they should be completed.

When the Chief of Engineers came before the committee he said that with $60,000,000 it would be impossible to complete the same in eight years, and that to do that it would require an annual appropriation of $75,000,000 for eight years.

Now, as has been stated by the gentleman from St. Louis, we are going to appropriate before the session closes not millions but two or three billion dollars to put people back to work. There is no question about that. I am in favor of taking care of the rivers that can be made navigable.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Is it not true that the money put into river and harbor work gives employment to more labor than any other money expended by the Government?

Mr. CLAGUE. That is absolutely true. There is less machinery used in river and harbor work than in any other kind of employment; the great amount of labor is performed by hand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I will.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Minnesota was here at the passage of the river and harbor bill referred to, and that the committee did not report that but it was put in on the floor, and the gentleman from Wisconsin himself voted for it?

Mr. CLAGUE. That is a fact. Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, $15,000,000 has been cut by the committee from the engineer's estimate. The amount carried in the bill is less than it should be. Vote down these amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I rise in opposition to the amendment which seeks to reduce the appropriation for river and harbor improvement and maintenance. The Chief of Engineers urged that $75,000,000 be appropriated for river and harbor work during the next fiscal year. However, this bill reduces the amount to $60,000,000, which is $15,000,000 less than the Board of Engineers deem necessary for the efficient and adequate prosecution of this work. I recognize that there is an urgent need for drastic reduction of governmental expenditures and that the people of the Nation are demanding that we practice sound economy wherever possible. My record will show that I have supported practically every sound economy measure that has been submitted to this House for consideration.

I have also opposed many large appropriations that I deemed unnecessary and improper, but, Mr. Chairman, there is a vast distinction between sound economy and false economy, and I think that the reduction of appropriations for river and harbor work at a time when 10,000,000 of citizens are unemployed and when every effort of the Government should be devoted to the great task of finding employment for our people would be indefensible. It is true that I have in my district the Sabine-Neches waterway, which has become one of the most important waterways in the United States. It is true that the tonnage that is moved over this waterway has increased tremendously, and that this waterway has made it possible for great industries that furnish employment to thousands of our people to locate in Jefferson County. Naturally I am very anxious to support a program which means so much to the people of my district. But in addition to this, Mr. Chairman, there are other potent reasons which justify my support of river and harbor improvement. The farmers of my district, as well as those of the State of Texas, are vitally interested in the development of our waterway transportation.

Our very distinguished and able chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, upon which I have the honor to serve, recently furnished me with some very interesting information in regard to the effect of waterway development upon the transportation costs of shipping cotton. I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness to our splendid chairman for this information and to take this opportunity to compliment him upon the splendid and able manner with which he has presided over this important committee. I feel that the State of Texas has been signally honored on account of his elevation to this important chairmanship, and the manner in which he has performed his duties in this respect has reflected credit upon the entire State. According to this information, the Houston channel was completed to 30-foot depth in 1926, and the Sabine-Neches ports in 1927. The Sabine-Neches ports received a material widening of channels and other improvements, which were completed in 1930. Houston received similar improvements, completed in 1931. Galveston received 2 feet additional depth, completed in 1929. Corpus Christi was completed to a 25-foot depth in 1926. It was authorized for 30 feet in the river and harbor bill of 1930 and completed to that depth some time last year.

The freight rates on cotton exports from Texas ports to British ports, as charged by the United States Shipping Board vessels, have been as follows: In the latter part of the year 1926 and the whole of the year 1927 the rate on Texas cotton was 60 cents per 100 pounds, or $3 per bale. In 1928, 1929, and 1930 it ranged around 53 cents to 55 cents per 100 pounds. In 1931 and 1932 the first-class Shipping Board rates went down to 45 cents to British ports, while contract rates on high-density cotton went down to 35 cents per 100.

The Mediterranean conference reduced the rates to Italian and Spanish ports for the past and present years from 45 cents to 35 cents per 100. The United Kingdom conference did the same thing on British shipments. The Bordeaux-Hamburg Range Conference reduced the rates from 45 cents to 30 cents per 100. The rates to the Far East a few years ago were on a 60-cent basis to Japan and 65 cents to Shanghai. At the present time these rates are 35 cents to Japan and 40 cents to Shanghai.

On Wednesday, August 26, 1931, the Houston Chronicle had a press report on cotton rates. The headlines were "Ship cotton rates again are reduced." This report showed that rates to certain ports, including Havre, Ghent, Rotterdam, Hamburg, and Bremen, had been reduced from 42 cents in the early part of the season, first, to 32 cents, and later to 30 cents per 100 pounds.

From this it will be seen that the ship rates on Texas cotton since 1927 have been reduced from an average of 60 cents to an average of 30 and a fraction cents per 100 pounds, or about $1.50 per bale, of which the Texas cotton farmer is entitled to receive the benefits.

Ship officers and experts have informed Congressman MANSFIELD that these rates would not have been possible but for the splendid condition in which our Texas ports have been placed in the past few years, which has greatly reduced the overhead cost in handling such freights. The excellent condition of these ports is now a great asset to the farmers of Texas, and without the improvements that have been made it would now cost $1.50 per bale more for export cotton to reach its markets.

This is extremely important because it is admitted that the price which cotton brings in foreign markets determines the price which the farmer receives for his cotton in the markets of the United States. Therefore, the less transportation costs the more the farmer should receive for his cotton.

I am inserting this information in this address to show that waterway and port development is not only important to everyone in Jefferson and Orange Counties, but also to the farmers of my district and the State of Texas.

Sufficient appropriation for river and harbor work is also important as a means of furnishing employment to many thousands of American citizens. The Engineering Department and those in a position to know estimate that 90 per cent of the appropriations for river and harbor work goes directly and indirectly to labor. This statement has been made several times this afternoon on the floor of this House, and it has never been challenged. I am opposed to any effort made in the name of economy to decrease appropriations for public works that will furnish employment to many of our citizens, and I hope this amendment will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the merits of this amendment have been discussed pro and con. I rise to call the attention of the committee to the effect of the amendment if adopted, and also to what I understand actuated the subcommittee and also the Committee on Appropriations in reporting the Budget estimates for rivers and harbors and flood control exactly as they were submitted. As has been stated by the Chief of Engineers and the War Department, the original sum asked for was $75,000,000, and that sum was reduced by the Budget to $60,000,000. The Chief of Engineers, General Brown, stated to the committee that he could use all of the $75,000,000 upon existing projects; that that amount is needed in carrying on those projects. Mr. Chairman, there is no public work which gives as much employment to labor in proportion to the amount expended as work done in river and harbor improvement. The committee, believing that it could reduce the bill and reduce the estimates of military nonessentials for next year by over $24,000,000, felt that in the interest of labor and employment it ought to appropriate the full amount estimated for this public work. They tell me that down there in the Mississippi Delta colored labor and other labor is receiving as low an amount as 90 cents a day, a miserably small sum.

It is a ridiculously small wage for this work, but I want to tell you in this day it is keeping body and soul together. Yet we are asked here to cut $6,000,000 from this particular appropriation because certain Members of this House are anxious to economize on this in order to justify more than $2,000,000 which was voted the other day to pay reserve officers during the 15 days they are in camp. I do not say that my good friend from New York [Mr. TABER] is actuated by that purpose, because the gentleman is a genuine economist upon our committee and one of its ablest members, and I am sure he was actuated only by the reasons expressed by him.

Additions have been made to this bill. We will have a record vote on them after a while, and we will see just where we all stand. [Applause.]. This bill has been increased $6,000,000, and now it is proposed to save that money, which was added in order to provide for reserve officers' pay for 15 days in the summer months and to provide for training camps, by cutting out this appropriation which is in the interest of labor.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I can not yield now. I am sorry.

It has been stated that we will be called upon to vote millions and perhaps billions of dollars for employment of labor before the Congress adjourns. Something must be done. Some steps must be taken to provide for those who are walking the streets to-day seeking jobs which do not exist. Something must be done to enable the men, women, and children who are without positions to live during the coming winter months. Shall we sacrifice those who would receive employment under this appropriation merely to give somebody pay, to provide summer camps during the summer time, when it does not affect the efficiency of our Army or in any way interfere with the national defense? We will be called upon directly to vote upon these amendments, which were added to this bill at the instance of my good friend from California, Mr. BARBOUR. Nearly all of you gentlemen upon the Republican side, with some few exceptions, joined by some of the Democrats, voted to adopt those amendments. Your President asked you to keep this bill within the $24,000,000 reduction recommended by the committee. Will you keep it within the $24,000,000, the reduction authorized by the committee, by doing so at the sacrifice of these needy people who are working upon these rivers and harbors, or will you do it in the interest of those who do not need it? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose both amendments. I think no wiser appropriations are made by Congress than those to improve our rivers and harbors. I am only sorry that I am to be denied the privilege of voting for $75,000,000, the original estimates, instead of the $60,000,000 carried in this bill. I extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the speech of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH].

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM H. DIETERICH, OF ILLINOIS, NOVEMBER 9, 1931, BEFORE THE UNITED STATES CIVIL LEGION

I am grateful for being accorded the privilege of addressing this gathering on this occasion.

Any citizen may take just pride in having been associated with this group of patriotic men and women who so unselfishly rendered service to this Nation when we were taking our part in a war the magnitude of which was unprecedented in all history.

The United States Civil Legion is composed of those citizens who gave their time, their talents, and their energies to the winning of that war.

It represents that group of the citizenship who constituted the great administrative forces of the Republic at a time when the man power and the resources of the Nation were being mobilized in the defense of the principles of democracy. It represents those citizens who protected our Army when our Army was protecting our Nation.

It represents those citizens who were defending the principles of representative government at home and in the civil forums of the nations of the world while the soldiers were defending those principles upon the field of battle.

It is made up of those citizens who established the standards of patriotism necessary to prepare the national mind and the national conscience for the greatest sacrifice that this country had ever been called upon to make.

President Wilson in one of his messages very truly said, "It is not an army that we must shape and train for war, it is a nation."

It was agreeable to the sentiment expressed in this statement that the Nation mobilized its talented and experienced citizenship and conducted an educational campaign teaching the lessons of loyalty, economy, courage, and patriotism.

They taught the lessons of patriotism from every rostrum in this land. They strangled disloyalty whenever and wherever it raised its treasonable voice. They taught wealth to forget extravagance and waste. They taught the idle and the indolent the lessons of industry. They taught the civilian to be frugal at home so that our soldiers and sailors would have those things necessary to sustain them in the struggle.

It is a rare treasure to be able to have a memory picture of that vast civilian army, composed of every trade and profession, of every political affiliation and religious persuasion, all working as a harmonious whole, exerting every energy to help carry the American flag, emblematic of liberty and justice to victory.

It is most gratifying when we recall how that army of organized civilians subordinated every personal or selfish interest and devoted themselves to the service of their country and carried forward the multiplicity of activities necessary to our triumph in that conflict.

When the matter of organizing our forces was engaging the attention of the Government the President gave utterance to the following timely advice: "The Nation needs all men, but it needs each man, not in the field which will most pleasure him, but in the endeavor that will best serve the common good. The whole Nation must be a team in which each man shall play the part for which he is best fitted."

Acting upon this advice we conceived and carried into effect the most just method of selecting those who were to serve in the various departments of both the civil and the military establishments that had ever been adopted by any nation of the earth, a method in which age, health, education, intelligence, and present employment determined the service to which the citizen was to be assigned, a method under which wealth was not in favor nor poverty at a disadvantage.

They invoiced every man of military age and, beginning with the age best adapted to military service, they placed each man in the branch of the service in which from physical fitness, mentality, experience, and training he was best suited.

In order to provide the necessary finances, including financial aid to those nations that fate had made our allies, the forging of the engines and the instrumentalities of war, enlarging our Navy, provisioning, clothing, equipping, and transporting our Army and training and equipping our air forces, they adopted the patriotic idea of the Government borrowing the money from our own people.

They directed the loan drives among the citizenship with the result that of the five requests made by the Federal Government in the short space of two years for loans aggregating $18,500,000,000 our people responded by offering to loan to their government $24,000,000,000.

It would take more time than would be reasonable for me to occupy to recount even in a general way the achievement of those civilians who so nobly measured up to those many important responsibilities.

There were organizations which were associated in this work and which rendered signal service which still carry on. Among those most active were the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare League, and the Young Men's Christian Association. They constitute permanent bodies that are still active in their various lines of endeavors and to the members of those organizations who are eligible for membership in the United States Civil Legion the matter of associating with us might not occur to them as being urgent.

The greater majority, however, of the various war-time organizations which constituted that civilian army which we are remobilizing ceased when the activities of the war were ended.

The war governors, the war-time Members of the National Congress, the war-time members of the various State legislatures, those in charge of the selective service administration, the department of publicity, the Liberty loan committees, the councils of defense, the reserve militia, the Coast Guards, and the numerous boards and commissions in charge of the different activities who labored together and shared the responsibilities of carrying forward this great work must necessarily still have a sentiment to keep fresh the memories of those accomplishments and an urgent desire to renew their war-time associations.

It would be a tragedy indeed if after their dismissal from the service the work they did should be thrust aside as of little moment and the opportunity should not be given for them to reassociate themselves.

The American service men most rightfully refused to let their mustering out of the service cause them to forget their comrades in arms and the memories of dangers past, and that their close relationship might continue and for their mutual help they organized their various ex-service men's organizations.

The United States Civil Legion, composed of those citizens who during the war time gave support to the soldier and upheld the Government, purposes to continue to uphold the Government and support the ex-service man in his postwar problems.

There are no citizens who better understand the circumstances, the conditions, and the surroundings of those who were selected for military service—there is no one in a better position to correctly estimate the sacrifice that the soldier made—than the members of this organization.

It should certainly be a source of consolation for the World War veteran to know that the citizens who understand his problems best still have a sincere interest in seeing that what he did shall not be forgotten and that justice shall be done by him and the widow and orphan of his comrades who are no more.

It is the moral duty of the members of the United States Civil Legion to see that the boys who were disabled in service receive proper care, that they are justly compensated for their injuries, that those who have since become afflicted are not permitted to suffer for the necessaries of life, and that adequate hospitalization is provided for these as well as all other disabled veterans.

The moral duty rests with this organization to see that those who were widowed by this war are provided with the comforts and necessaries of life.

The duty rests with us to see that those who were orphaned by this war are given proper care, that they receive proper training for some suitable vocation so as to enable them to become useful citizens, and that the star of opportunity and hope is kept shining above their pathway.

It is not, however, the war-time associations and the moral obligations to those who served beneath the flag that constitutes the only reason why this civilian army becomes aggressive in the work of reorganization, the need for reassociating this group of citizens is more urgent than the mere matter of exalting a service well done.

Never before in the history of the world has there been a peace-time period during which there existed the unrest and the anxiety and the concealed enevy of one nation for another that exist to-day.

Never in the history of this Nation has there been a peace-time period when there was more needed militant Americanism and patriotic leadership than the present time.

The United States Civil Legion has an important peace-time service to perform. It was organized for definite purposes, among which, in addition to those I have just mentioned, are to help bring about an adequate defense of the United States through support of our armed forces on land and sea and in the air; to furnish the necessary civilian leadership to popularize the peace-time program of our national-defense forces; and, finally, to become an organized soldiery of citizenship to work for the advancement of America and to protect the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy as conceived by the American founders.

Upon these purposes I ask your indulgence while I make some observations.

This Nation is not militaristic by tradition or disposition. We have never waged a war of conquest; we have only resorted to arms in defense of the liberties of our people when the righteousness of our cause justified the unsheathing of the sword.

During the early periods of our national existence when our citizenship was busy subduing the wildernesses and developing our natural resources, when our own people were consuming most of our manufactured products, and when our prosperity was not dependent upon our commerce with other nations not much significance was attached to the strength of our Navy or the efficiency of our Military Establishment.

Military training during the early periods of our national existence was not necessary to teach our citizens the use of firearms. The fowling piece was a household necessity and the boy became familiar with the use of the rifle long before he arrived at the military age.

We felt secure in our own protection, we rested content in our knowledge of the patriotic zeal of our people and their willingness to respond to their Nation's call.

We had demonstrated to our satisfaction time and again that the citizen soldier of America was superior to the fighting man of any other age or nation.

This was first demonstrated when the Colonial citizenship took up arms in the War of Independence.

It was demonstrated at New Orleans when a few regiments of Kentucky and Tennessee riflemen defeated a trained British army commanded by one of the ablest generals of his time, in which memorable battle they defeated the army that afterward crossed the seas and destroyed the army of Napoleon on the field of Waterloo.

It was demonstrated in the war with Mexico when we settled the rights of the once Republic of Texas with reference to the international boundary line.

It was demonstrated when the armies of the North and the South faced each other on a hundred battle fields.

It was demonstrated when that great volunteer army offered its services and forever put an end to the Castilian cruelty in the Antilles.

It was conclusively demonstrated to the world when the citizen soldier took his place in the battle lines of Europe and turned defeat into victory and won a war that had been lost.

The wildernesses have been turned into populous States; there is no longer a golden West to allure and give activity to the ever-increasing population. The natural resources of our country have not only been developed but some have already been exploited; many a change has taken place in our national life, and some of these changes are just cause for alarm; the new world has passed into the old.

A land of contentment and plenty has changed to a land where overproduction and unemployment are the problems of the day, where extravagance and want dwell side by side.

Internationalism has taken the place of Pan-Americanism and the money gleaned from the industries and resources of our Nation has been invested in the industrial securities of other lands. These investments have grown to such proportions that a depression in Europe not only reflects itself but rocks the very foundations of the business structures of this Nation.

These investments have grown to the extent that it will take true patriotism, honest and wise judgment, and a decade of time to disentangle us from the web in which these unwise and unpatriotic speculations have enmeshed us.

When the World War was over, the winning of which was made possible only by throwing the flower of American manhood and the unbounded resources of the American Nation into the scales when the balance was unmistakably in favor of the central powers, we neither asked nor received a rood nor a farthing in reimbursement of the many billions of dollars expended and the many lives that were lost while the other allied nations demanded and received the national obligations of the vanquished foe for full reparations.

In the meantime we had loaned to our Allies various amounts aggregating over $14,000,000,000 to enable them to defray their necessary expenses in the prosecution of the war, for which amounts they issued to us their national obligations.

These loans were provided from the money loaned to our Government by our citizenship and upon which our Government paid a fair rate of interest; these interest payments were made from the taxes levied upon our people and our industries.

The nations of Europe have busied themselves ever since the war closed not in paying but in negotiating reductions in their indebtedness to us through the game of diplomacy; and they have succeeded in having us, without any visible consideration, make such reduction on interest as has netted them a savings of several billions of dollars and increased the burden of our own people to that amount.

They now tell us that we will be enriched by giving some fifteen thousand millions of dollars of our people's money to the nations of Europe. That such action is necessary to produce a friendly understanding to promote prosperity and achieve permanent peace.

Let us ever remember that nations are not unlike individuals in their dispositions and dealings. Selfishness, greed, and avarice are the characteristics of some nations as well as of some men.

Let us ever bear in mind that the disposition to evade obligations when obligations become burdensome, the disposition to profit by the transaction, and the temptation to be unfair in order to profit are national weaknesses as well as the weakness of individuals.

Laying aside all this and accrediting every motive with purity of purpose, let us never forget that the sense of obligation will not necessarily be present in the governments and the citizenship of to-morrow to repay the favors and the sacrifices that we make to-day. A draft made by our children on the bank of European friendship may not be honored.

Along with the propaganda of the forgiveness of obligations under the appellation of "moratoriums," "holidays," "postponements," and other soothing terms, all springing from the mother-word "cancellation," which word the people have come to understand and for which reason its use is carefully avoided, comes the peace propaganda for the reduction of armament and the opposition to appropriations for the national defense.

Our longing for peace will not justify this Nation in neglecting to prepare for her necessary defense against possible invasion or conducting offensive warfare in case our liberties are challenged, our national honor prostituted, or our national obligations wilfully and deliberately ignored.

The nation which allows the sentiment of peace at any price to influence its course of dealing becomes a degraded coward, forfeits its respect, surrenders its obligations, and in the end allows the liberty of the citizen to be destroyed.

There are some things worse than war. We can sometimes pay too great a price for peace, but we can never pay too high a price for maintaining our national honor, our national principles, and our national traditions.

Our traditions and history in which every call to arms has been a call in defense of humanity, our generosity in victory, our national disposition to peace, our aid to suffering humanity extended to every clime and every creed, and our love of the principles of human liberty are so well known that no civilized nation need fear injustice at our hands.

We have no people to oppress, no possessions to hold in forced subjugation, no neighbor toward which we cherish a feeling of hatred, no past wrongs inflicted against us as a nation or against our people concerning which we keep the fires of vengeance burning, no desire to hold dominion over any people, and no desire to profit except in the legitimate channels of peaceful enterprise.

So long as the militaristic nations of the world maintain naval bases along the coasts of the continents of America and maintain such navies as they consider necessary to protect them in their possessions and their commerce, the United States should maintain a navy of like adequacy in both defensive and offensive warfare, that adequacy not to be determined by a comparison of ships, guns, or tonnage with any other nation.

No authority on earth has the right to dictate the armament of a nation when such armament has never been employed except in the cause of justice and in defense of humanity.

No earthly power has the right to tell the nation to lower the range of her guns when those guns have never fired a shot except against injustice, oppression, and tyranny.

America standing as she has always stood upon the principles of justice and liberty for all owes it to her people to maintain a standing army equal to meet any emergency until her citizenship can be mobilized, and to provide sufficient and effective equipment to defend against any possible invasion until her manufacturing industries can be converted from their present production to the production of the arms and munitions of war.

Large standing armies do not necessarily spell preparedness, but a trained citizenship possessing a general knowledge of military duties does.

The institution that to-day more correctly represents our idea of military preparedness is the Reserve Officers' Training Corps established by various acts of Congress during and since the World War by which proper military training is given to those citizens qualified for that service enabling us in the event it should ever again become necessary to call our people to arms to have the necessary trained citizens to organize and discipline our armies.

This organization can do no more useful work than to lend its aid and encouragement to the establishment, the continuation and the enlargement of these activities.

Every decade of our history brings to military age over 5,000,000 of the young manhood of this country, and we can render a useful service to the cause of liberty by teaching that young manhood of America the necessity of taking a reasonable course of military training, by seeing that the training camps are adequately supplied with the latest approved equipment in arms and other instrumentalities useful in battle, and that proper instruction is given in military tactics and in the use of arms and the engines of war.

It was the pernicious propaganda that America was unwilling and unequipped for war more than any other factor that ultimately brought us into the world conflict.

Military preparedness is just as potent for the promotion of peace as it is for the winning of wars.

No more beautiful sentiment could animate any group of people than that purpose of this organization contained in the statement "to become an organized soldiery of citizenship to protect the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy as conceived by the American founders."

This means that in order to accomplish this, adherence to principle must be placed above partisanship.

Political parties were not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, but it soon became apparent to the observing that such groups might be formed.

Washington did not approve of the formation of political groups or parties and forewarned us of the mischief that would result in case this course was adopted by our people. He knew their tendency to promote the interest of some particular section or some particular group without regard to the interest of the people as a whole through organizations of this kind.

He also foresaw that designing nations not friendly to our Government or its institutions could exert their influences through party channels. In his Farewell Address he sounded the prophetic warning that "It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy annd will of another."

We can not, however, undo the past, and to-day political parties constitute or should constitute the agencies by which the will of the people finds expression in the policies of government, and this is the avenue through which we must work to carry out the object I have just mentioned of protecting the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy as conceived by the American founders.

This group of men constituting the United States Civil Legion who were big enough to lay aside party and creed and join in working for a common cause in a national crisis during the period of war are certainly big enough to do the same in a national crisis during a period of peace.

They can do much toward its accomplishment by discouraging unjust criticism and unwarranted exaggeration as well as discouraging the more harmful practices of deliberately refusing or willfully falsifying facts gathered by officials in their official capacities pertaining to matters concerning which the people have the right to be informed in order to shape their action or cast an intelligent ballot.

They can accomplish much by insisting that integrity mark political action and political utterances for if we are to be governed by parties, then the parties are necessarily the pillars of the Government and the Government constitutes the superstructure and the superstructure can remain stable only as the pillars give strength to its support. If the pillars fall, it necessarily follows that the superstructure must also fall.

History tells us that the rise of anarchy, during the period after the ending of the Revolution and before the adoption of the Constitution, ceased as soon as the people began to understand the Constitution; that with that understanding grew a wholesome respect for that organic law and a patriotic willingness to submit to the Government outlined therein.

That Constitution was written in simple language; the people had no difficulty in acquainting themselves with its provisions, and it met with their entire approval. But that Constitution that the people thought they understood has been changed and departed from until the citizen no longer professes to know its meaning, and his confidence in the basic law of his country has been shaken, if not destroyed.

No citizen who has a reasonable knowledge of the English language can fail to understand what was intended by the last of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, which provided that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The citizen is somewhat mystified when in the face of this provision he sees the Federal Government exercise arbitrary power in the regulation and control of all matters, police and otherwise, pertaining to the States of the Union as well as their people.

Washington in his Farewell Address stressed the importance of following the Constitution as adopted by the convention and not permitting encroachment of one department of the Federal Government upon that of another and the keeping of those departments separate so that they can act as checks and safeguards to each other.

This advice of the Father of our Country has also been disregarded. Little by little has one department encroached upon the other and taken to itself the exercise of functions belonging to the other. Little by little the executive forced the legislative into passing such laws as would meet the executive idea and little by little have the legislative and executive coerced the judicial in placing its stamp of approval on the constitutionality of laws that were passed for partisan purposes and political expediency.

The judicial department of our Federal Government which was supposed to be the department to determine the rights of the citizen, whenever controverted questions arose, has gradually, following one pretext or another, been disrobed of many of its judicial functions. To-day we have the spectacle of unskilled political appointees judicially determining the rights of citizenship in the revenue and other departments of the Federal Government, with the only redress left to the citizens to appeal from one appointee to another, with the road that finally leads to a determination of his rights by the judicial department of his Government so difficult, technical, and expensive that it is more economical for the citizen to surrender his rights than to attempt to obtain a remedy.

All these things have had a tendency to create a disrespect by the citizen for his Government and all have been brought about by reason of the fact that the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy as conceived by the American founders have not been properly safeguarded.

So in order to bring about, in an orderly way, without disturbance, without bitterness, using reason as our only weapon of warfare, the accomplishment of the purposes of our order, the civil legion begins a militant crusade.

It tenders the services of its membership to the ex-service men to help achieve the objects for which they are striving. It offers its energies for military preparedness in every department of the military service.

It consecrates itself to the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy as conceived by the American founders.

And finally, it pledges the lives and fortunes of its membership to resist any attempt to change the form of the constitutional Government established by the fathers and substitute in the place thereof the uncertain and unstable and dangerous ideas of communism.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

In view of the fact that the debate on this amendment has been lengthy, the Clerk will, without objection, report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE].

There was no objection.

The amendments were again reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were ayes 54 and noes 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Flood control, Mississippi River and tributaries: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the flood control act, approved May 15, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 33, sec. 702a), $31,773,775.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: On page 73, in line 8, after the figure "$31,773,775," insert "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for payment of wages except such as are determined and paid in accordance with Public Act No. 798, Seventy-first Congress."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LANHAM). In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment is a negative restriction upon the appropriation, and for that reason is a limitation and would be in order. Unless the gentleman from Mississippi desires to be heard further, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. Goss.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is this not already existing law?

Mr. GOSS. No. I am sorry to say there is an exception made with regard to flood control. I understand the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has that matter under consideration now and we are hopeful that that committee may bring it out so that it will become law.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is not being considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GOSS. By the Committee on Flood Control. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. There is no legislation of that kind pending before the Committee on Flood Control.

Mr. GOSS. I have been informed that there was.

Mr. KELLER. It is before the Committee on Labor.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that if this amendment is adopted, the old so-called Davis-Bacon wage bill, Public Act No. 798, will take effect on the contracts in the Mississippi flood-control area.

I have been informed that many of the workmen have been paid as low as 90 cents per day on this type of work.

The plea was made on the previous amount we just kept in the bill for rivers and harbors work and also for flood control, that it was needed to keep people employed. Now, I say in all fairness, if that is what is in the minds of those who have spoken in behalf of this legislation, Congress should see to it they are paid a fair wage, and a fair wage as determined by this public act. Why rivers and harbors work and flood control are immune from this particular public act I have not been able to find out, and I hope the Committee on Labor will report that bill some time this session, because there is no good reason why this particular work should be exempted from its provisions.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. I have listened to the gentleman very carefully. What is his purpose? What does he seek to do?

Mr. GOSS. I am simply advocating in this amendment the application to rivers and harbors and flood-control work the Davis-Bacon wage bill, Public Act No. 798.

Mr. PARKS. What is it?

Mr. GOSS. I will read it to the gentleman if he wants to know. I am surprised the gentleman is not familiar with it.

Mr. PARKS. No; not at all, but I doubt if the gentleman is familiar with it because he can not tell me what it is.

Mr. GOSS. I will read it to you:

Be it enacted, etc., That every contract in excess of $5,000 in amount, to which the United States or the District of Columbia is a party, which requires or involves the employment of laborers or mechanics in the construction, alteration, and/or repair of any public buildings of the United States or the District of Columbia within the geographical limits of the States of the Union or the District of Columbia, shall contain a provision to the effect that the rate of wage for all laborers and mechanics employed by the contractor or any subcontractor on the public buildings covered by the contract shall be not less than the prevailing rate of wages for work of a similar nature in the city, town, village, or other civil division of the State in which the public buildings are located, or in the District of Columbia if the public buildings are located there, and a further provision that in case any dispute arises as to what are the prevailing rates of wages for work of a similar nature applicable to the contract which can not be adjusted by the contracting officer, the matter shall be referred to the Secretary of Labor for determination and his decision thereon shall be conclusive on all parties to the contract: Provided, That in case of national emergency the President is authorized to suspend the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 30 days after its passage but shall not affect any contract then existing or any contract that may thereafter be entered into pursuant to invitations for bids that are outstanding at the time of the passage of this act.

Now, I submit the House, in all fairness, should adopt this amendment, because if we are going to provide money in the bill to relieve unemployment let us relieve unemployment with a living wage.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose the gentleman is trying to accomplish, but it can not be accomplished through attaching the Davis-Bacon bill to the appropriation bill.

The truth is the Labor Committee has for months had under consideration the very question the gentleman has been discussing.

The Davis-Bacon bill directs the Secretary of Labor to determine, wherever there is a dispute, what the prevailing wage scale is in the community where the work is being done. The Labor Committee has found through hearings that were that law applied to rivers and harbor work and to flood-control work it would be necessary to fix a scale of wages below even the low scale now being paid. Therefore, the committee has reported a bill, which is on the calendar, known as the Connery bill, which does attempt to fix a living scale of wages for this class of work. In addition, the Senate has passed the Metcalf bill, which takes in public works of all kinds and would do exactly what the gentleman from Connecticut seeks to do by his amendment.

Those who come from the territory where this work is being done know that the prevailing scale of wages in those communities is the farm-labor wages, which are below even the scale being paid now by some unfair contractors. I think we ought to have legislation to make them pay a decent rate of wages. I am just as much in favor of it as anybody can be, but if we apply the provisions of the Davis-Bacon bill to this work, the only thing the Secretary of Labor could do would be to fix the farm-labor wages as the wages to be paid for this work, and they would be even below the scale of wages now being paid by the contractors.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not better policy to settle this by legislation rather than by an amendment on an appropriation bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think so, unquestionably; and I think the Committee on Labor will probably report out the Metcalf bill or something similar which will take care of the situation.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would apply to laborers engaged on flood-control work; and I want to emphasize again I am very fearful that instead of accomplishing the purpose the gentleman desires, with which I sympathize, it would result in making it absolutely necessary, under the law, to fix a lower scale of wages than is now being paid.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I suggest to the gentleman the Davis-Bacon law says the wages to be paid shall be wages for work of a similar nature—not farm labor, but for the same kind of labor that is being done.

Mr. RAMSPECK. But this is common labor, and the only prevailing wage scale in the areas where flood-control work is being carried on is for common labor on the farms.

I am very fearful that the amendment, if adopted, will have the opposite effect from that which the gentleman hopes to accomplish.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the Chairman permit me to ask a question before the motion is put?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. I want to offer an amendment to reduce the appropriation. That is a very vital part of this section. Does the chairman of the subcommittee want to shut me off and deny me the opportunity to do that?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I do not wish to deny the gentleman the opportunity of offering an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out "5 minutes" and insert in lieu thereof "20 minutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the motion was rejected.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to show you exactly where the proposal of our friend from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] leads. There is being spent right now in Washington, the Nation's Capital, millions of dollars of public money on construction work. If you will get the Washington Post of this morning, you will find therein that the master builders of Washington have reported to the carpenters that they can not pay over $9 under present circumstances. When you remember what our friend from Tennessee said—that on rivers and harbors work many laborers are getting 90 cents a day—the carpenters of Washington, from public money, ought to be glad to get $9 a day, and yet when it was put up to a vote they turned it down almost unanimously, and they insisted on $11 a day. The master builders first offered $8 per day, which was turned down, and they came back yesterday with a proposal to compromise the matter, making it $9 a day. If you will look in this morning's Post you will find the following:

CARPENTERS REJECT $9 PER DIEM SCALE—THREATEN TO WITHDRAW MEN FROM JOB IF BUILDERS CUT WITHOUT CONSENT

The second wage referendum submitted in two weeks to the Carpenters' District Council last night resulted in rejection of the proposal of the Master Builders Association to cut wages.

The original proposal of the builders was to reduce the $11 per day wage scale to $8 per day. This proposal was rejected with a vote of 12 to 1, and construction operations paying less than the union scale were "locked out" by the carpenters. About 40 men were removed from work, according to L. H. Hardison, president of the council.

A compromise offer of a $9 per day scale was submitted by the builders. At the meeting last night at Masonic Auditorium 846 ballots were cast and only 225 carpenters were willing to accept the reduced scale. Hardison said the council was open to any other offers proposed by the contracting group, but that any attempt to cut the union wage without the consent of the carpenters would result in the removal of the men from the job.

So you see that the 846 carpenters here, who are reveling in desirable Government work and receiving high wages from public moneys, turned it down and said they would not accept $9, and they are demanding $11 a day, which is beyond the price that is paid for carpenters in every city of the United States except Washington. So my friend from Connecticut will see just where it leads.

Is he insisting that the carpenters of Washington should turn down a $9 per day proposal like that and insist on receiving $11 a day, when his carpenters up in Connecticut are not receiving any such sum?

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I do not know anything about the carpenters here in Washington, but it has been admitted that in Mississippi and in the gentleman's section, laborers receive 80 cents and 90 cents a day. That is far too low.

Mr. BLANTON. Not in my section, if you please. None of the money is spent in my section. There is no such public work done in my section, but there is work done in Connecticut and paid for by Connecticut people.

Mr. GOSS. Not at 90 cents a day, I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. No; but no carpenter in Connecticut now receives $11 a day, I will say to my friend, while 846 Washington carpenters receive $11 per day from Government money.

It is just such laws as my friend is proposing here that permit the carpenters of Washington to stand up and say they will not take $9 a day, but demand $11 a day, when 7,000,000 men elsewhere are starving to death and can not get a job for $1 a day.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The reason why the Davis-Bacon Act was enacted was because your southern contractors bid in competition with northern contractors paying a living wage, and they based their bids on their 90 cent and $1 a day labor.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin and my friend from Connecticut that in the city of Dallas, which is one of the leading cities of my State, contractors are paying as high wages as will be found to be paid in any city of the United States except Washington. They always pay the highest wages in the world down there. In Galveston, Tex., the home of my good friend CLAY BRIGGS; in Houston, where I was born; in Fort Worth, the home of our friend, Mr. LANHAM; and in San Antonio, the city of my friend, Mr. KLEBERG, they pay as high wages as are paid anywhere in the country except in Washington. You talk about southern contractors. They are paying their men as high wages as you will find in any city in Wisconsin or in Connecticut. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] ought to get away from Milwaukee some time. He ought to get away from this 1-road track from here to Milwaukee. He ought to come down to Texas and see what progressive people are. He would find that there are more progressive cities in my district in western Texas than he has in the entire State of Wisconsin.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman is for a high wage scale, he ought to be for the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 73, in line 8, strike out the sign and figures "$31,773,775" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$26,773,775."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this is a reduction of $5,000,000 in this appropriation. For more than a week I have been in the House listening to the debate pertaining to this bill. Everyone realizes we must have some economies in the operation of government. Here we have the military bill, a bill pertaining to the Army, but where does the reduction come in? Does it come in on the pork-barrel part of the Army bill or does it come in on the national-defense part of the Army bill? The amendments up to date have been to endeavor to restore to this bill that part which is taken out of it pertaining to the national defense. The committee accepted the Budget Director's report on the pork-barrel part of this bill, but when it comes to the national-defense part of this bill there is where the committee makes the reduction. [Applause.]

Under the Constitution the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army, and I say to you in all fairness and in all candor it is a dangerous policy for you and me to undertake to sit here on the floor of the House and repudiate and ignore the advice of the Commander in Chief of the Army in the matter of national defense. Yet we do it, for what? In order to try to save our faces for our extravagance in this session of Congress and to try to excuse ourselves before the country for not reducing the expenses of government.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. McGUGIN. Not at this moment. I shall yield to the gentleman later.

Then, when we come to this bill, the report of the Budget Director is good enough on the pork-barrel items but is not good enough on national defense.

A great deal has been said here about what the President wants in connection with national defense. In his statement of March 26 he had this to say:

> We should not further reduce the strength of our national defense.

There is the President's statement, and it is not subject to any misunderstanding or any argument between two Members of the Congress. On March 26 he said we should not reduce our national defense; and now when I see this Congress and this committee refusing to reduce the pork-barrel part of this bill—the grab part of it—in which your constituents are interested, then is when I turn face about and here and now say that when the roll call comes to-day, I am going to vote for the Barbour amendments. [Applause.]

I am not going to give up the defense of my country when you are not willing to give up the pork barrel, if you please. [Applause.] You know it is pork. You know the rivers and harbors item is pork, and every man in the United States knows it is primarily pork. A good part of your flood relief is pork, and we know it is going to be the means for contractors to steal from the Government and rob slave labor.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; I yield now to my good friend from Alabama.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thank the gentleman. It was indicated here by two reputable gentlemen that the President said he expected this bill to leave this House with certain cuts in the appropriations.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Where are those cuts going to be made?

Mr. McGUGIN. In the pork barrel, if I can have my way about it. [Applause.] In flood control, as you call it here, and in rivers and harbors; and that is where the President wants it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Has the President said so?

Mr. McGUGIN. That is his public statement of March 26.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But the President has not said so. If that is the President's position, we are very glad to know it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

It is said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN], who has just taken his seat and who has proposed the amendment to reduce the appropriation for flood control on the Mississippi River $5,000,000, that appropriations for flood control are pork-barrel legislation. The gentleman evidently spoke hastily. Flood control is a part of the internal improvement of the country, and the leading statesmen of the Nation have always advocated national internal improvements. If promotion of navigation and the protection of lives and property are pork-barrel legislation, my reply is that such legislation is desirable and commendable.

The improvement of the Mississippi River and control of its floods is a national problem. The great flood of 1927, in the language of Herbert Hoover, was the greatest peacetime disaster the Nation has ever known. The flood control act of 1928 was passed as a result of the sacrifices and losses caused by the flood of 1927. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has called attention to the fact that the President of the United States advocates river and harbor work in aid of unemployment. Whom will my friends on the Republican side follow, the President of the United States or the gentleman from Kansas? As the gentleman from New York pointed out, President Hoover was so exceedingly desirous of fostering river and harbor work that he sent a special message to Congress on March 14, 1932, requesting Congress to make appropriations for this work immediately available. I quote from the message:

> I therefore recommend that the Congress give consideration to immediate appropriation of the funds for the maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works in order that we may avoid the unemployment and dislocation which will arise from such delays. Such a course would imply no increase in the contemplated expenditures.

There was attached to the message of the President a report from the Director of the Budget. This report contained the views of the Secretary of War with respect to river and harbor work. I quote from the statement of the Secretary of War:

> It was considered in the public interest to press the work during the past winter season in the interest of the unemployment situation and to advance the work under present favorable conditions of prices.

In the matter of flood control it is quite evident that both the President and the Secretary of War are in absolute accord. Who is right, the President of the United States, who advocates river and harbor work in aid of unemployment, or the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN], who speaks derisively of flood control as pork-barrel legislation? In the matter of river and harbor work and flood-control improvement I prefer to follow the recommendations of the President of the United States rather than the half-baked and ill-considered views of the gentleman from Kansas. [Applause.]

Pork-barrel legislation involves the passage of legislation in many cases without consideration of the merits involved. Such is not the case with legislation for the flood control of the Mississippi River.

The flood control act of 1928 authorized the appropriation of $325,000,000 for flood-control works in the lower Mississippi River. No other project was under consideration. The case was considered upon the merits of flood control on the Mississippi River. There was no opportunity for pork-barrel legislation. The act was passed after the most careful studies and exhaustive hearings ever held by a committee of Congress. The gentleman from Kansas, in speaking of flood control on the Mississippi River as pork-barrel legislation, betrays an utter unfamiliarity with the subject. The flood control act passed both the Senate and the House by practically a unanimous vote. It was approved by President Calvin Coolidge, who always stood for economy.

In times past pork-barrel legislation has been applied to river and harbor legislation. The gentleman from Kansas, in referring to flood control along the lower Mississippi River as pork-barrel legislation, is evidently not familiar with the history, progress, and problem of flood control, as provided by the act of May 15, 1928. The adoption of his amendment to reduce the annual appropriation by $5,000,000 would not defeat flood control. It would merely postpone the appropriation and delay the completion of the project. It would take legislation to change the existing law, which provides for the control of the floods in the lower Mississippi Valley. The gentleman's arguments for economy are just about as applicable as his arguments in opposition to flood control.

Pork-barrel legislation involves a multitude of projects, some of which can not stand on their own merits. Such is not the case with flood control along the lower Mississippi River. It constitutes the greatest single internal improvement project ever undertaken by the Government. It was considered and as an independent proposition was passed almost unanimously by Congress. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] evidently spoke without giving the subject his usual careful thought. On reflection, I feel sure that he will not again characterize flood control along the Mississippi River as pork-barrel legislation. The Middle West is interested in the improvement of the lower Mississippi River for navigation to reduce freight rates, and flood control is essential in all projects for navigation.

I maintain that reduction in the appropriation for Mississippi flood control would not only be false economy but would be a dangerous policy. I oppose the amendment for the following perfectly manifest reasons:

First. The Chief of Engineers, Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, recommended $35,000,000 for Mississippi flood control for the next fiscal year. The Director of the Budget reduced the amount requested to $32,000,000. The Appropriations Committee followed the Budget, and the bill carries $32,000,000 for flood control. We are now asked as a matter of economy to reduce the annual appropriation. Such reduction would be false economy and would probably cost the Government more in the future than might be saved at present. There is no economy in fact, for a reduction in the appropriation is merely a postponement. It means delay in flood-control protection.

Second. The pending bill carries a reduction of 10 per cent from the previous annual appropriation. A further reduction by the House would be unjust. If the House singles out flood control and further reduces this item, the probability is that the policy that now obtains in the Senate, and which did obtain in the Interior appropriation bill, would result in a further horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. Flood control would thus be singled out. This internal improvement would be discriminated against. It would be unfair to reduce with a probable further reduction by the Senate.

Third. The adopted project provides for raising, strengthening, and enlarging the main-line levees. The flood danger is ever present. We have the experiences of 1929 in the Greenville, Miss., area in mind. There was the highest water in that area that ever went down the river except the great flood of 1927.

The plan provides not only for a continuously enlarged levee line but it is important that it be completed at the earliest practicable date. If there are openings or incomplete levees, delay may be dangerous. Floods come at intervals. It has been five years since the flood of 1927. There is the greater danger of the greater loss from an overflow. The best economy for both the Government and the people is the immediate completion of the levee line. Instead of delaying the work, instead of reducing the appropriation, now is the appropriate time to speed up the work. No levee line is stronger than its weakest link. There is always the possibility, if not the probability, under the law of averages, of a greater loss from an overflow than the entire costs of levee improvement.

Fourth. In December, 1930, upon the recommendation of President Hoover, Congress appropriated $3,000,000 for flood control and some $22,000,000 for rivers and harbors as an emergency measure in aid of unemployment. Labor is the chief beneficiary in flood-control improvement. Just recently, as I have stated, to emphasize the importance of the work the President sent a special message to Congress, asking that funds be made immediately available for river and harbor work in aid of unemployment. Not only does flood-control improvement provide for the protection of the lower Mississippi Valley but it contributes much to the solution of the unemployment situation that now obtains.

Fifth. Some of our friends who now favor a reduction in the appropriation for flood control advocated the emergency highway-construction legislation that passed the House on February 27, 1932. Their advocacy was based upon the plea that highway construction would aid unemployment. My friends are inconsistent in opposing flood control. Flood control not only provides employment, but it contributes to the protection of life and property and aids in improving the Mississippi River for navigation.

Sixth. I summarize by urging Congress not to reduce the appropriation, and I maintain that a reduction might result in a great loss. Much property may be destroyed, and many lives may be sacrificed. Unemployment would increase. The flood control of the lower Mississippi River, which is the greatest navigable river in the United States and the world, would be hindered. Delay would be dangerous. The result might be loss and destruction. There would certainly be no economy either to the people or to the Government. In the name of the people of the Lower Mississippi Valley, whose direct losses in the flood of 1927, according to President Hoover, amounted to $200,000,000, with indirect losses of $200,000,000 more, and recalling that 245 people lost their lives and that 700,000 people were driven from their homes in the flood of 1927, I protest against a reduction in the appropriation for flood control. There is no economy in withholding the expenditure of $1 where $100 of economic loss might result. Reduction in the appropriation is not only dangerous but incompatible with national economy. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment. Strike out "15" and insert "20."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my amendment and make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I was never so startled in my life as when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] talked about reducing this appropriation for flood control, and called it a pork-barrel proposition.

I can not conceive of anybody of his age and presumed intelligence who could not remember the scenes in this House in 1928, and had read in the newspapers about the terrible tragedy, could be induced to offer this kind of an amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman think that a reduction of $5,000,000 will ruin the appropriation?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes; I think it would. You might as well take the powder out of the pyrene extinguisher as to take this $5,000,000 out of the flood-control appropriation.

I will tell you why. We fought these floods for years and finally got the Government to take over the flood control on the lower Mississippi River. Before that time every local district had a flood-control proposition of their own. In one place you had a fine levee, and in the next you had a poor levee, and then in the next place perhaps no levee at all.

This work must proceed rapidly, the work ought to be done all at once if possible, because if the water breaks through in one levee it lets the water in behind, and your entire levee system and the whole line will be destroyed.

The people of the South have paid in $290,000,000. We have spent nearly $100,000,000, and are you going to permit, by taking this $5,000,000 out of this appropriation, a greater danger than we had in 1927?

There were 18,000 square miles flooded. I think $5,000,000 may be enough to complete some portion of the work that is necessary for the entire work.

Now, anybody that calls a proposition that will save the flooding of 18,000 square miles pork, and the saving of 700,000 peoples' homes pork—I can not understand how anybody can be misled in that way.

The gentleman from Kansas is like the preacher who stated his text, and then went on and forgot it. He offered this amendment, and then went on to talk about something else. Upon the theory that he might have religious scruples about that, I excuse him. Of course, I was not here to vote on these amendments in regard to reserve officers and all that, but I am for them.

Mr. Chairman, economy can be practiced in a right way and in a wrong way. The economy that we want to practice is economy in things not absolutely for the preservation of life and property. This amount of money is absolutely necessary at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What I can not understand is how the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] could plead so eloquently for his river and harbor matters up yonder, and go along with us and appropriate the money, and now fight the legitimate river and harbor appropriations.

Mr. REID of Illinois. I do not think the gentleman from New York did that. This is not pork in any way, and people ought not to be fooled by any such statement.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman state whether or not we use a set amount every year for this purpose?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes. In 1931 we appropriated and used $37,000,000. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] is going to tell you about it, and he will tell you the number of laborers employed. That is not sufficient to complete the work, and we pretty nearly had a flood this time.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman state whether or not we are continuing on a certain line of work all of the time on these levees?

Mr. REID of Illinois. They are raising the levees continually.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID], the former chairman of the Committee on Flood Control, has answered all of the argument about the pork barrel. I think the vote on the amendment to reduce the appropriation for rivers and harbors will certainly satisfy those who are interested in navigation in so far as this particular part of the appropriation is concerned, because when we will have completed the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio and tributaries, on which the Government will have spent over a billion dollars, all of the freight and tonnage to be carried by those rivers will be collected at Cairo, Ill., at the beginning of this flood-control project, to be carried safely along the main channel of the Mississippi River on to the Gulf and on to the markets of the world. One-third of this appropriation goes to improvement for navigation, affecting the most important navigation project in the entire United States. Practical economy would be to avoid unreasonable losses and prevent great disasters. This is emergency work for that purpose. The appropriation that we have in this bill for flood control is to carry on and continue the execution of an emergency project. Of the $32,000,000 carried in the bill for flood control, the Government pays out to labor that it hires $14,308,447. That amount carries an average of over 6,000 men in employment on this project from Cape Girardeau to the Gulf all the year around. Of the $37,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931, $22,970,679 went to labor, an annual average of 9,000 people being employed. In other words, of this appropriation for flood control, 54 per cent of the entire amount appropriated goes into wages, to maintain employment. The remainder of the appropriation, practically all except overhead, goes into the purchase of material and supplies.

So, if we are interested in continuing and increasing employment and paying wages to labor and for the purchase of supplies from American citizens, we could not vote any reduction in this appropriation. The flood control act of 1928 authorized $325,000,000. Including this appropriation, of that amount $137,000,000 has been provided. The Chief of Engineers testified before the Committee on Appropriations as well as before the Flood Control Committee that although the project on the main channel was outlined to be completed by 1938, with the progress they are making now, getting better contracts, executing the work at a less cost, completion would be obtained by 1935, saving three years on the main feature of the project. That is most important.

If you can avoid disaster which might come from a flood that may occur at any time, costing ten times this appropriation, and if you are hastening the completion of the project under the present organization, you will be saving money. I do not know anything that would be further from economy in a practical way than to reduce the appropriation for flood control on the Mississippi River. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I shall vote against the amendment offered by the distinguished Republican from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] to reduce a very essential appropriation. We can all remember several years ago when people's lives and homes were being destroyed by reason of an act of God, the terrible floods in the Mississippi Valley, how everyone promised to do what they could to prevent a recurrence of the disaster.

In these days of unemployment in an endeavor to limit the appropriations for this essential work the gentleman from Kansas calls it "pork" perhaps because the money will be expended in some of the Mississippi River States and not in the State of Kansas. What kind of pork was the gentleman from Kansas supporting the other day when he passed between the tellers and voted for $1,500,000 to fight grasshoppers in the State of Kansas. [Applause.]

I believe that if the Representatives from the States of Kansas and Nebraska can vote in these times of financial distress $1,500,000 to fight grasshoppers in their States, they can consistently vote sufficient money to provide the necessary works to protect human lives in the Mississippi Valley if another great flood should come upon the people of the Mississippi Valley States. [Applause.] Let us not be facing this way to-day and the other way to-morrow, the way some of these Democratic economy peddlers do. Mr. BYRNS, the gentleman from Tennessee, and the rest of the alleged economy experts, to-day eloquently speak in favor of this bill as a means of furnishing employment to the unemployed. The other day they spoke as eloquently in the name of economy in favor of throwing thousands of additional people into the river of unemployment.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] wondered about the inconsistency of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. When it comes to inconsistency the gentleman from Texas takes the prize. Three weeks ago the gentleman from Texas, in the very well of this House, said that Bishop Cannon was responsible for putting President Hoover in the White House, and only a few days later he said that WILL WOOD put Hoover in the White House.

The gentleman from Texas always talks about economy when he thinks it is well for his political purposes to do so. When the War Department appropriation bill was up he forgot that in time of peace we must maintain an adequate defense to protect the lives of our people and our country in time of war. In time of peace we should also provide sufficient appropriations for flood-control works which are necessary to protect the lives of our citizens from the enemies within, particularly the wild, raging rivers, when they overflow their banks and threaten the destruction of the lives and homes of our people. The Treasury did not topple in 1919 when the Democratic Party increased our national debt to over $29,600,000,000. The Republicans have reduced that debt to approximately $18,000,000,000. Let us issue bonds and carry on the necessary public works if these works are opposed because of the condition of the Treasury according to the position taken by the gentleman from Kansas. The building of public works will also assist in relieving the unemployment which now exists. Many Democratic demagogues on and off the floor of the House condemn the President and the Republican Party for an increase in appropriations for their operation of the Federal Government notwithstanding the fact that the increase to a large extent is the result of spending many millions for rivers and harbors work and for public-building work in your own States. Tear off the camouflage of your economy hypocrisy and get down and face the facts. Do not follow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], one day facing one way and the next day facing the other. If you are really in favor of economy and in favor of helping that poor, badly battered Treasury and the taxpayers, vote for that beer bill next Monday and get $500,000,000 into the Treasury each year. [Applause.] There will then be more funds for pork, if you want to call it that, in your dry Southern States, and your people will not be taxed to raise those funds, and you will get the benefits, and you will not have to bleed and die in the name of economy as many of you have done this session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be notified when I have consumed two minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I am a 2-minute speaker, so it does not hurt to cut my time. I can say enough, in my judgment, in two minutes to defeat this amendment. In company with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID] I went over all of this flood area in the South when it occurred. We flew from Vicksburg down to Simmesport and then across to New Orleans, and we examined every part of that flood area. If you had seen the sights which we saw there would not be anyone from Kansas or any other State who would raise a hand against appropriating money to stop the great floods of the South. When we flew over there we could not see a particle of ground in any place all the way from Vicksburg to Simmesport. All we could see was water. We could hardly find a church steeple. Those poor people had been submerged in that water or moved out or had flown out on account of it. Then Members get up here and call it "pork." I think that is beyond expression. The thing for us to do is to pass this bill as is [applause] and not take a dime away from it, because I am satisfied that some of you who will remain in Congress may find a day when there will be another flood just as bad as that one, and if it is neglected now, when there is an opportunity to build up against it, there will be no one to blame but yourselves.

I sympathize with these men from the South and I am opposed to any amendment to reduce this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, much has been said about war during the discussion of the bill; and the proponent of the pending amendment has declared his purpose to support the retention of 2,000 officers of the Regular Army for the purpose of properly preparing for the contingency of future war.

Let me admonish you gentlemen that the people in the Mississippi Valley affected by this item are engaged in warfare every day of their lives. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] may not be aware of conditions there, and the only possible excuse for the proposed reduction that could be given in fairness is to credit him with ignorance of such conditions. In 1927 in that valley 240 lives were lost and $300,000,000 of property damage was done.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I have only three minutes. If you insist, I will.

The gentleman from Illinois gave a statement of the conditions in the valley. If any part of the levee system is weak it means the flooding of the valley below the breach because a few yards of dirt were not thrown at the proper place. It is peculiarly emergency work.

In 1914 the Mississippi River Commission fixed the grade and section for levees on the river. As stated by the gentleman from Alabama, the work ceased during the war; nothing was done during that time except a little maintenance work by people locally. Therefore it was not until 1920 that work was resumed, and we were unable to build to the specified grade and section in the limited time before the great flood of 1927 was precipitated upon the valley. The only sections of the valley that were protected in lives and property were the sections that were so able to build to the engineers' fixed grade and section, and one-third was saved in this way.

We do not know three months in advance when this army is going to invade the valley or when our levees, our lives, our property will be destroyed for want of proper and consistent prosecution of the work.

This is an emergency, gentlemen, and there ought not to be one dollar stricken from the appropriation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

In view of the lengthy debate, without objection the amendment will be again reported for the information of the committee.

The Clerk again reported the McGugin amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter all expenditures by or on behalf of the Inland Waterways Corporation shall be accounted for and audited as are expenditures by the executive departments and establishments generally, but in such connection the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized to sanction the use of moneys provided for the operations of the corporation, and to allow credit accordingly for expenditures not otherwise allowable, if and when established to be reasonably necessary to a proper functioning of the legal activities of the corporation.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. MCDUFFIE. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MCDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, may I take just a minute or two to call the attention of the House to a rather ridiculous situation—I will not call it ridiculous; it is just funny—we are faced with? Here we have the chairman of the great so-called Economy Committee of the House objecting to a measure that will save money for the Treasury. The language objected to by the gentleman from Alabama, the distinguished chairman of the so-called Economy Committee, was inserted in the bill at the request of the Comptroller General of the United States to save money.

It was called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations that the director of the Inland Waterways Corporation—General Ashburn—a few months ago awarded a contract for Diesel engines to other than the lowest bidder. He told me himself he did not have to do business with the lowest bidder, but that he could select any bid he pleased, as he did in this case, where he has paid out of his treasury for Diesel engines to go into one of his river boats $26,000 more than he could have purchased engines of the same specifications from a low bidder who was thoroughly responsible; and, in fact, was the largest Diesel-motor builder in the United States.

By virtue of the law under which this corporation was incorporated Uncle Sam owns all of the outstanding stock, and it is one of the few agencies of the Federal Government where a purchasing agent does not have to do business with the lowest responsible bidder. That is true, I believe, of the Shipping Board and the Panama Railroad.

This language has been inserted in the bill in the interest of economy and sound business judgment at the request of the Comptroller General, and yet the chairman of the Economy Committee objects to this procedure and says the language is subject to a point of order. It is subject to a point of order, but it should remain in the bill. The gentleman is going to strike it out of this bill.

It has been put in the bill to save money for the Treasury, but the chairman of the Economy Committee wants to strike it out on a point of order, and probably will because, no doubt, the point of order is good. However, this language ought to stay in the bill, because it simply provides that hereafter the Inland Waterways Corporation will be compelled to do business with the lowest responsible bidders when it advertises for materials and supplies. That is only fair. That applies to every other branch of the Government except this agency and one or two others.

How anyone can assume the attitude of the Economy chairman himself and still maintain that he favors general economy is hard to understand. Good business, fair competition, economy in government, all demand that this Inland Waterways Corporation accept the language of General McCarl and carry on in open, dignified, orderly procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist on his point of order?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. I think the gentleman from Illinois is unduly alarmed. This corporation is functioning well. It was by this Congress placed in a separate status from the average Government agency. So far as its reports go, they show that this corporation has made a profit for the Government and that there has been no waste in the operation of the corporation. I am not urging the continuance of this corporation; but so long as it does continue, its present status should not be disturbed unless it be shown that a change would result in savings.

Now, if the gentleman knows anything about steamboats—I do not know whether he does or not—he knows that there are times when it might be absolutely necessary for the man who operates this corporation to turn down the lowest bid because the bidder did not meet the specifications for a particular engine for a particular type of boat. That is all that happened in the case mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

There is nothing here to show that any economy will be effected under this provision; on the other hand, it might have the opposite effect.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this paragraph is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. COLLINS. May I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that this provision will not hinder them from doing the thing which the gentleman suggests.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I reserve it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LANHAM). The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order against the paragraph that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. In the opinion of the Chair, it is very clearly such legislation upon an appropriation bill that does not come within any of the provisions of the Holman rule, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The limitations on the expenditure of appropriations hereinbefore made in this act shall not apply to the appropriations for the Panama Canal.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish at this time to speak out of order and in reference to a statement made by Senator WALSH in his minority views upon the Finance Committee's report to the Senate. He stated in reference to the coal amendment, which I presented and had passed through the House, that—

The proposed duty on coal and coke as carried in the present bill, in our judgment, is utterly preposterous.

He also stated——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is quoting from a Member of another body, and I think we should have order in order to hear what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BOLAND. He stated:

The proponents of this tariff have but one objective. They hope to displace 600,000 tons of imported anthracite coal now sold in New England with an equal amount of Pennsylvania anthracite.

I want to take exception to that statement. The proponents of this amendment are not so much interested in the replacement of 600,000 tons of foreign anthracite coal in New England, but they are very much interested in the anthracite industry of Pennsylvania being destroyed by the shipment of foreign coal into this country. We object to that statement.

In line with that I wish to present to Congress to-day petitions sent to me by Mr. Charles H. Dorrance, of Scranton, Pa., and signed by 55,000 residents of Pennsylvania in protest against the shipment of this foreign coal into this country, which is destroying our industry. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. It was not understood that in presenting the petitions the gentleman from Pennsylvania was going to put these 55,000 signatures on those petitions in the RECORD, because that would accomplish no good purpose. I want it understood that these signatures do not go into the RECORD.

Mr. BOLAND. I do not want them to put the names in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman on his proposition, but I am against those signatures going in the RECORD, as printing them would cost a large sum of money.

Mr. BOLAND. I do not want the signatures to go in the RECORD, but I am anxious to have the petition noted in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, the statements made to the Senate are misleading. They would like Congress to understand that the excise tax on foreign coal would be no benefit to the country. I can not see the consistency of this position in supporting measures to put men back to work and relieve this depression and at the same time antagonize a measure that means so much to the citizens of Pennsylvania, especially the men who work in the coal mines. If these shipments of foreign coal continue to increase coming into the United States it will be only a short time when one of our country's natural resources will be totally destroyed and hundreds of thousands of its citizens thrown out of employment. This foreign coal is being mined by indentured and cheap labor and is destroying the market of our own commodity. I sincerely hope that the Senate now debating upon these excise taxes will pass this amendment and thereby bring happiness and contentment to the people of Pennsylvania whom I have the honor in part to represent in Congress.

I feel sure if the Senator understood all the facts as they exist in the Pennsylvania coal regions and the unemployment and suffering resulting from the importation of foreign coal he would align himself in support of this meritorious measure.

I know these men and I know the menacing effect resulting from this foreign imported coal and as a Member of this Congress it is my duty to bring this important matter to the attention of my colleagues of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if the conditions were not so serious, the statement made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] would appear amusing and ridiculous, especially in view of the fact that during the consideration of this bill and during the entire session the gentleman has opposed every effort that has been made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] and the Democratic side to reduce expenditures so as to enable us to comply with the often-repeated manifestos of the President to balance the Budget.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. I can not yield now. I shall yield to the gentleman later on.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to correct the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SABATH. I can not yield now. I will give the gentleman all the enlightenment he may desire later on.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not want any enlightenment.

Mr. SABATH. That is the great trouble with my colleague. Day after day from the White House the President, through the press and through some of his representatives on the floor, makes the country believe that he is for economy, and every time a vote is taken on the floor, when real economy is proposed by a Democratic committee, I have observed that with the exception of 16 Members and once with the exception of 23 Members, the balance of the Republican Members have voted to increase instead of to reduce the expenditures. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] with that loud voice of his applauds. He accused the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of being inconsistent, and I am sure the House will agree with me that he does not need my defense or that of any other Member. If there is such a thing as being inconsistent, the gentleman from Wisconsin is the champion of inconsistency.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Has the gentleman been able to find out which one of the gentlemen, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] or the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY], was right in regard to the consistency of the President?

Mr. SABATH. I believe that both of these gentlemen were right and wrong in view of the fact that the President seems to change his views nearly every day as the occasion or political expediency requires. Speaking to the militaristic group, to the Sons and Daughters of the Revolution, he assures them that he is for further expansion of our Army and for a greater number of officers, but in his messages to Congress and in his newspaper interviews for the consumption of the public, he is for retrenchment and economy; of course, the different assurances he has given to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] have been stated by both of them and these inconsistent statements have been made on the same day. But I shall not go into that, because it is nothing unusual to hear contradictory statements emanating from the White House.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], the very gentleman whom the gentleman is talking about this morning, took more savings out of the economy bill than any one man on this floor?

Mr. SABATH. I realize that; and that is the reason I insisted on securing the floor to bring attention to the fact that he himself, although he is a personal friend of mine, is not consistent. [Laughter and applause.] The only thing I regret is that he does not vote right. He preaches one thing and practices another, the same as a majority of the Members on that side.

A few minutes ago I desired to secure the floor while we were considering the flood-control provision, but unfortunately was unable to do so; and I am going to say now what I desired to say then. I have been one of the Members of the House who has, at least to some extent, aided in establishing the Flood Control Committee, and I have voted for all appropriations which I deemed necessary to preclude the disaster of a few years ago.

But of late, when I have studied the appropriations and the expenditures for the flood control and waterways, I have found that nearly 30 per cent of our appropriations go for overhead expenses and mostly to the military high dignitaries or engineers who are so bombastically defended by these generals on the floor of this House who, in their militaristic way, fight and oppose every proposition that tends for economy. I greatly deplore that these militaristic gentlemen, some of whom are now on the retired list and drawing their splendid allowance, do not realize and recognize that it is impossible for our country to continue to be as liberal as it has been with them and that it is absolutely necessary to reduce the extravagant allowances or expenditures somewhere. Of course I appreciate that some of them, and many of their able aides on the floor, as had been stated, have been born with a silver spoon in their mouths, and that they have no conception of the hardships to which the people of this country are subjected, especially at this time, to pay additional taxes to make possible the maintenance of our Government.

They do not realize the trials and tribulations of 90 per cent of our citizens to earn, or to reach the point to earn, sufficient compensation or wages to provide for their families. Many of these generals, who have been swarming through this Capitol in the last few days, entered West Point at the age of 18 or 19. And from the day of their entry they receive compensation and education at the expense of the Government and are provided for for life, as when they reach a certain age they are retired, as I understand it, at three-fourths of the salaries they receive on active duty; and this, in the majority of instances, amounts to three to five thousand dollars annually. Surely no one who has ever had the opportunity to go through Presidio at San Francisco, Fort Myer, or Fort Sheridan and attend some of the many festivities will say that the provisions the Government makes for their well-being are meager. Therefore I feel that they should be the first to come forward in times like these of their own free will and dispense with some of the luxuries which they are now enjoying, when, as I have stated previously, 90 per cent of the civilian population of America is in distress and in dire need of relief from overtaxation. We hear so much of the first line of defense, but thus far I have failed, and all of you have failed, to observe any move on their part in defending the organized attacks upon the depleted Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, in the last few days I have been seriously considering whether it would not be proper to tax all Government employees, including those in military service, instead of reducing the salaries of our civilian employees earning more than $2,000 annually, as I had advocated. And if these military gentlemen are as patriotic as they claim to be, then they should not oppose the proposal; in fact, they should come forward and say, "We are ready to do our share and our part to help balance the Budget and relieve the overburdened taxpayers."

I am satisfied that many of them would gladly do so, if they could but understand the seriousness of our financial difficulties, and I would like to hear from some of these military gentlemen or their advocates what possible objection there could be to my proposal. Now, here is a suggestion entitled to serious consideration, and I wonder what their reactions will be. I am inclined to believe that the number of those who would enlist in this proposition would not be commensurate with the number of privates who enlisted to serve the country in her hour of need.

I am the last man in the world who would detract from the great achievements of some of our splendid and brave and courageous officers; but these are not the men who have devoted their energies and time in the corridors of our Capitol and who lobby for increased pay and advancement; these men look with disfavor upon such activities. I am certain that at a close scrutiny it would be disclosed that the less actual military service individuals have rendered the greater are their claims for greatness and deserts.

In all seriousness, I feel that the propaganda under the guise of "no impairment to the national defense," which on the one hand has been going on against any reductions and on the other hand for increases in this bill is an outrage and shame. It is high time that we take heed of the demand of the country and start voting right and start to bring about the economy which you are preaching and trying to make the country believe you are in favor of. I think it is an outrageous proceeding, and I think it is a clear conspiracy that you are practicing on the American taxpayer and on the American people generally.

Perhaps this editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of May 16 may more poignantly and more diplomatically express my views on this subject:

If the various governments would take their heavy hands off the resources of the country, the people could get back in their stride again. They can not so long as they are exhausted in trying to meet the demands government makes upon them.

It is self-evident that money can not be diverted into nonessential and nonproductive processes of government and still be had for the work by which the people subsist. Industries can not live by paying taxes instead of dividends and by reducing pay rolls to satisfy government imposts. Cutting the costs of government is obnoxious to the authorities which must make the decision, but the Government is living upon dying resources. It does not produce subsistence. The people can not live upon it. They can not take their livelihood from it. It depends upon their success. So obvious a truism can not be supplanted by a fallacy for the cure of national ills. The thing which lives only by the work of others can not provide life. The parasite does not support its victim.

Mr. BRITTEN. Now, will my buddy yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman referred in very glowing terms to the distinguished chairman of the so-called Economy Committee. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and myself voted together in favor of that economy bill, but the gentleman from Alabama himself voted against it. How does the gentleman account for that?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Alabama does not need any defense at my hands, I assure the gentleman. The country appreciates his noble and sincere and honest efforts in behalf of economy. [Applause.]

I fully appreciate that I shall again be attacked by these professional militaristic officers for my position in refusing to vote for the additional millions which they desire for the 2,000 officers and their perquisites and the maintenance of their automobiles; but between those who live in splendor and luxury, as they are living, and the millions who are unemployed and hungry, my heart goes out to the latter, and my conscience compels me to try at least to aid them. I should like to read, with your permission, a statement in this regard that appeared in the Baltimore Sun:

MILITARY MYSTERY

To see in true perspective the decision of the House of Representatives to reduce the number of Regular Army officers by 2,000, it is necessary to take account of the fact that of the 12,133 officers now on the active list of the Regular Establishment, only 5,031 are actually serving with troops in this country and in all our insular possessions.

It is doubtless true that of the 7,102 officers not actually with troops many are performing service reasonably essential to the national defense. The 466 officers on duty in connection with the National Guard seem, for example, to be doing work as important in its way as the work of those who are engaged in the training of troops. But even so, the presumption must be that with 7,102 officers not on duty with troops and with the troops presumably supplied with an adequate quota of officers, a reduction of considerable proportions in officer personnel could be effected without serious consequences.

After all, the country is in a great deal more danger from extravagance to-day than it is from a foreign invasion, our jingoes to the contrary notwithstanding. The need to put our own domestic finances in order is much more imperative than the need to maintain a tremendous and costly military machine for use against a conjectural foe who, if we conduct ourselves prudently, may never materialize. Why, when we have a very pressing need for economy and no present need for a large Military Establishment, there should be such a hullabaloo over the shifting of 2,000 officers to the retired list, where they will still draw three-quarters pay and be subject to the call of the War Department, is one of the mysteries of this baffling age.

I should like very much to have some of the military gentlemen answer this editorial.

True, I have voted for the pensions, for the increased pay of enlisted men and lower-grade officers, and for compensation and proper hospitalization; yes, I have voted for the bonus, rather the adjustment pay, and I will do everything in my power to see that the balance due to the veterans is paid in cash, regardless of the attitude of the officers. And I shall anxiously await the position these officers will take in helping the passage of the bonus bill to aid the 2,000,000 needy and deserving ex-service men. I feel that if they would exert only one-half of the influence to help the needy boys as they have utilized for themselves it would materially aid in securing favorable action for the bonus bill, which the President, however, is unfortunately opposed to. And I wish to say that I heartily indorse the plan provided for in the Patman bill, which does not call for any bond issue but only the issuance of Treasury notes. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLZEY. Mr. Chairman, I urgently hope the chairman of this subcommittee will have a roll call on the various amendments that have been adopted during the consideration of this bill whereby $6,000,000 has been added to the appropriation for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department. I am making this request in the earnest hope that many Members of this body will reconsider and thereby save this Government $6,000,000.

Recently the President of the Nation issued a clarion call to the people of America, appealing to them to support him in a rigid program of economy. In response to that call the people of my State, far deep in the Southland, have written and urged me to give my earnest cooperation and support to the President in this program of economy. Your people, no doubt, have written you the same thing, and yet many gentlemen, particularly on the other side of the aisle, have added appropriation after appropriation to these bills. I should like for you to consider a few facts with me during these few minutes.

Several days ago you had an opportunity to consolidate the Army and the Navy, and it has been conservatively estimated by the committee that you would have saved the Government approximately $50,000,000 a year. This you failed to do.

Then, at a later date, there was a movement in this body, a strong and determined effort, to prevent that part of the bill passing whereby 2,000 Army officers were to be relieved from active duty. This will save the Government, I am informed by the chairman of the subcommittee, approximately $20,000,000 a year.

Since then the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has added amendment after amendment to this bill which will cost the Government $6,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, the reason for these added appropriations, you contend, is that the national defense would be impaired. Yes; you have given undue stress to the national defense. Let us consider a few facts. During 1917, when war was declared, the Nation sent out a call for men. At that time our country had a weak national defense. To-day I am advised that we have ten times as strong a national defense as we had in 1917, and besides we have the American spirit of patriotism and love of service. The youths of America went to the battlefields of France and there made a record that is now history. Against them came the famous Prussian Guard, representing a nation with a strong national defense. You know the rest of the story. Then, after the was was over, approximately 5,000,000 American boys, well trained in the fundamentals of war tactics, were scattered through the United States from Maine to California and from the State of Washington to the Gulf of Mexico. Yes; all over this country can be found these World War veterans who would within 24 hours respond to the call of their country if the Nation should need them.

As I have listened to these pleas in behalf of the national defense it would seem that many of you gentlemen fear that another war is not far distant. There is not a man here who does not know full well that no nation on this earth can finance another war at this particular time. I say that such propaganda is mere camouflage. True national defense lies in the patriotism of her sons; it is found in the respect that the American people have for this Government—that is true national defense.

We are now passing through a great crisis—one that challenges the best thought and action of the Nation's statesmen. Your people and my people are discouraged. Many are in want and distress. They are looking to us for help. These patriotic citizens expect you and me to reduce all Government expenditures to the minimum. Yes; they also expect us to reduce appropriations for the national defense as much as possible. When you and I courageously perform this duty and once more regain the confidence of the American people—in our Government—there will be no need to fear the strength of the national defense. Let me appeal to you to perform your plain duty. Reduce the national expenses as far as possible.

I say to you, the American people are restless, impatient, and they have a just reason for same. Yes; they have become threadbare. It is high time that we come to their rescue. Like Cicero in the days of long ago, the American people would be well justified in saying to us:

O, Cataline, how long will you hurl your unbridled audacity upon us? How long will your patience abuse us?

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. It is very easy for you who have never had an opportunity for service to talk about raising a million men overnight. I want to say to you that if you will go back a few years in history and recall when an army was sent into France the Government had to resort in the end to conscription in order to fill the ranks. May I further call your attention to the fact that you sent over men unprepared, who went over the top unable to fire a musket.

I believe I know something about national defense.

The gentleman talks about love of country and the little likelihood of another war. Does he realize to-day that there is in the Orient a flame that any moment may break out, that will mean a conflagration? It may not reach you, but my part of the country, Seattle, will be the first place to be bombed in case there is warfare in the Orient.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am in the same boat that the gentleman is.

Mr. HORR. At that time there will be no France, no Belgium, no Italy to hold the hordes back until our people get ready and are prepared.

Mr. ELLZEY. I want the gentleman to distinctly understand that I rendered volunteer service in France, but I believe it is as much my patriotic duty to save every dime for my country in this great crisis as it was to volunteer in 1917.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman served in France, he must have forgotten conditions as they existed then if he undertakes to tell us that men can be thrown into conflict without preparation. I do not doubt the gentleman's patriotism, but I do question his ideas of economy. Economy is not economy if it is destructive. Many a man to-day is receiving compensation from the Government because of the fact that he was unable to take care of himself in time of dire disaster. Then again you talk about your economy on your side. I appreciate the gentleman's idea of saving money for the country, but where was he yesterday when on his side of the House his leaders rose and with all the complacency in the world voted $4,000,000 out of the Treasury. How did the gentleman vote yesterday on that bill? This kind of economy makes me just a little bit out of patience. We talk of saving and you bring in an economy measure that means a $40,000,000 saving. The next day you who are in the majority bring to us another measure squandering over $100,000,000. If that is economy, I would like to know it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. Yes; sure. I will yield to anybody at any time.

Mr. WHITE. And is not it true that this army that was sent over, for 15 months of that time was not equipped.

Mr. HORR. Absolutely. Does anybody else want to ask a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. How long did President Hoover keep the gentleman up talking to him the other night when he kept him from attending a convention in the State of Washington?

Mr. HORR. I think it was about the same length of time that the gentleman spent here when he was arguing about saving that old fort down on the Rio Grande. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKS. On what page of the RECORD will I find the speech that the gentleman made against this $4,000,000 yesterday?

Mr. HORR. Oh, I am not for that kind of a measure. I do not speak against every bill you present that I oppose or I would be speaking all the time. I tell you that you are going to appropriate for unemployment relief, and you ought to quit kidding yourselves into this hysteria of economy.

Mr. PARKS. What side is the gentleman on?

Mr. HORR. I am on the side of taking care of the Government without cutting out the core of its existence.

Mr. PARKS. In other words, you want this appropriation to stand?

Mr. HORR. I want the appropriation to stand; and, if it is for efficiency's sake, to advance more to carry on the affairs of the Government and not by some gesture attempt to fool the public and throttle it.

Mr. PARKS. And the gentleman wants to get it by killing the bill in offering to strike out the enacting clause!

Mr. HORR. The gentleman knows I am saving the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules, if a point of order is made, there can be only five minutes more debate on this motion.

Mr. COLLINS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Texas begins, will he yield to me?

Mr. BLANTON. If it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not going to say more than half a dozen words. I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the statement was made that all of the soldiers had to be called in by conscription. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I want to remind the gentleman that we called them without a chance to get in in any other way.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am amazed at the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR], a military man, who wants to destroy the entire Army appropriation bill. If his motion to strike out its enacting clause carries, there will not be one dollar for any military purpose whatever appropriated. If he strikes out the enacting clause of this bill, which he by his motion seeks to do, our Army will go out of existence, and what will become of his people out in Seattle, whom he says would be the first to be bombed?

Mr. HORR rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I will yield in a minute. When he says there will be no France, no Belgium, and no Italy to hold the hordes back from Seattle, and they will need a big United States Army, just why, then, does he want to kill the Army appropriation bill? I want the gentleman not to attend any function at the White House the night before those wild hordes invade and bomb Seattle, because the President might keep him up talking to him until 12 o'clock, and he would not be able to fly to Seattle in time to save it. I happened to read a little article in the Washington Daily News for May 10, 1932, being an interview the United Press got from the gentleman in Seattle and wired to the News, which I can reproduce word for word almost. It stated that Mr. RALPH HORR was on his way to attend a Republican State convention in Washington.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. HORR. Oh, do not interrupt the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. And that he had to take an airplane, but he struck a storm and he had to come down, and he said that the reason he did not get to that State convention in Washington was because President Hoover had sent him an invitation to dinner, and he said an invitation from the White House was a command to a Congressman and he could not refuse, and that the President talked to him until late in the night. Here is the article, heading and all:

DRY PLANK ADOPTION BLAMED ON HOOVER'S DINNER BY REPRESENTATIVE HORR

SEATTLE, WASH.—RALPH HORR (Republican, Washington) to-day complained that President Hoover prevented him from reaching the State Republican convention in time to work for adoption of resubmission prohibition plank.

"After I had announced I was flying west for the convention," the wet Congressman said, "President Hoover invited me to dinner at the White House. It was virtually a command.

"Then instead of retiring at 10 p. m., as he usually does, the President sat talking until far into the night. I couldn't get a plane until 3 a. m. On top of that we flew into a storm, and by the time I reached Salt Lake City the convention had adopted a dry plank."

HORR suggested the invitation was inspired by Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington, a dry, and that "they knew about the storm, too."

For fear that the United Press and the Washington News might not have gotten his exact position correctly, I want to be absolutely fair with my military friend from Seattle [Mr. HORR], hence I will now show you what his own hometown newspaper, the Post-Intelligencer, of Seattle, Wash., said in its issue of Monday, May 9, 1932, to wit:

HORR BLAMES TRIP DELAY ON HOOVER, JONES—PRESIDENT'S DINNER INVITATION FORCED HIM TO MISS STATE CONVENTION, HE DECLARES—WASHINGTON SENATOR ENGINEERED AFFAIR SO OPPONENT COULD NOT SPEAK, IS INTIMATION

By Lester M. Hunt

When President Hoover invited him to dinner at the White House Thursday night the President didn't want to feed him—he wanted to fool him, Congressman RALPH HORR asserted upon his arrival in Seattle yesterday.

The Congressman attributed his presidential summons to Senator WESLEY L. JONES, long champion of the dry cause, and President Hoover.

HOW IT HAPPENED

It served to prevent HORR from reaching Seattle in time to "deliver a message" to the State Republican convention, which went dry with HORR 800 miles away in Salt Lake City.

HORR was also expected to pay his respects to JONES, as he did at the Bellingham convention two years ago. JONES's supporters here wanted him to stay in Washington, D. C.

Here's how HORR says it happened:

"Last Monday morning I announced that I would fly west Thursday morning to attend the State convention in Seattle.

"The next morning I received an invitation to have dinner at the White House Thursday night. It looked funny to me. Why should Hoover ask me to dinner? I voted against most of the things he wanted in Congress. But I couldn't refuse. It was virtually a command."

LEAVES AT 3 A. M.

So HORR arranged to leave by special plane immediately after the dinner, and still had time to reach Seattle before the convention adjourned.

The President usually goes to bed by 10 o'clock, but not that night, HORR said. He seemed delighted with the gentleman from the West. And they chatted and chatted.

HORR finally took off at 3 o'clock Friday morning and flew into a storm "that they probably knew was coming." He scratched his face in a forced landing in Pennsylvania, was forced down in Nebraska, and finally reached Seattle the day after the battle.

HORR described the "dry swing" at the State convention Saturday as "a joke."

"I am running for office this fall and I am running wet," he declared.

He plans to return to Washington Wednesday.

Mr. BLANTON. Surely, Mr. Chairman, his own hometown paper has not misquoted him.

When he accepted the President's "command" to go to the White House to a dinner, he ought to have known intuitively that the President "did not want to feed him," but "merely wanted to fool him." And some wet Republican should have told him not to imagine that the President would go to sleep at 10 o'clock but that, entertained by such delightful company, the President would keep him up until 3 o'clock in the morning talking to him. When before had the President enjoyed such a wonderful opportunity to talk? Being such an expert militarist, our friend should have known that getting off late from Washington, at 3 a. m., his Government plane would be sure to strike a storm and have to come down, as the President was commander in chief over both the Government plane and the Government pilot, and in the meantime the Washington State Convention of the great Republican Party would meet and would go dry, but if he had been there it would have gone wet. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. HORR. May I state for the edification of the gentleman from Texas that I have never, in all my travels in the air, encountered such blasts as I have just encountered now. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman strikes the political blasts that our friends John Miller and Senator WESLEY JONES are going to give him there this fall, he will think that my blasts look like 30 cents.

Mr. HORR. Just tell his majority.

Mr. BLANTON. But I am sorry the gentleman did not get there. I am sorry the President fooled him. I am sorry that he let that great Republican State convention meet without him. I am sure he could have changed its action. I am sure they would not have voted dry if the wet gentleman had been there. I am sure he could have changed its whole program. I am sure he could have changed the thoughts and opinions of all those great stalwart Republicans in the great State of Washington; but it did go dry, as the gentleman was sent off up into the air and did not get there in time to stop it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a few minutes I will, gladly. My friend is just as inconsistent now, when he speaks against this War Department bill, when he speaks against this Army appropriation bill, where, if he should get passed his motion to strike out its enacting clause, he will be striking at the very life of the United States Army and the Army would be wholly without money, and it could not turn back the horde of foreign invaders with their bombs if he strikes out the enacting clause. He is just as inconsistent when he still talks wet in spite of the dry action by the dry Republican State convention of the State of Washington.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman may rest very easy that the vote in the State of Washington next November is not going to be dry.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it will go Democratic then, because the Republican State convention in that great State has already gone dry, and I predict that the State of Washington will vote dry next November.

Mr. BRITTEN. If it goes Democratic it will be wet. That is where all the wets are coming from.

Mr. BLANTON. There are more wet Republicans in this House than wet Democrats. The Republican State convention which met in Seattle, Wash., on May 7, 1932, voted against repeal of the eighteenth amendment and stood for strict enforcement of all laws. Here is the Associated Press report of its action which appeared in the Post on May 8:

G. O. P. IN WASHINGTON DOWNS REPEAL EFFORTS

SEATTLE, WASH., May 7.—Defeating attempts to insert a prohibition repeal plank in the State platform, the Republican State convention here to-day adopted a party platform that calls for "strict enforcement of all laws."

The prohibition amendment was not mentioned. A request of John J. O'Brien, of Seattle, that a clause calling for submission of the prohibition question to State conventions be added to the program was voted down, 474 to 446.

If the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR] had not gotten lost up in the air after talking with the President at a "command" dinner in the White House until 3 o'clock in the morning, we "drys" would have lost the great State of Washington.

But I want to say to my friend that I do object to the way his old-time friendly newspaper, the Evening News, of Bellingham, Wash., referred to his escapade in the air. In its issue of May 10, 1932, in a double-column editorial, it refers to him under the heading "The Egregious HORR." And it says that "Congressman RALPH HORR, of Seattle, invited to be guest at dinner at the White House by President Hoover, ascribes to the President the use of a virtual 'command' to dine as a cheap political trick arranged between the President and United States Senator WESLEY L. JONES to detain HORR from attending the Washington State Republican Convention in time to deliver a tirade against prohibition." It was correct in using the term "tirade," because that is what he would have delivered. And the editorial continues:

A more flagrant or egregious breach of kindly hospitality in high places than that of Mr. HORR has not been recorded. Stanch Republicans reading of HORR's claim were of one mind that it should be called to President Hoover's attention at once.

I do not like for a Republican newspaper even in the old home town bailiwick of my friend from Seattle to make such unkind references to him. But I object most of all to the balance of this 2-column editorial, which says:

Many things are done at Washington in Congress and in politics that might better not be done, yet are passed and accepted, but HORR's action is one that is not done at all by gentlemen of any intelligence. It is explainable as due either to crass ignorance or a cheapness of mental and social attitude positively amazing in one who has been elected to Congress. It is also amazing that the King County voters, who were chiefly responsible for sending HORR to Congress, could have been so misled in their candidate, being otherwise a reasonably enlightened and responsible electorate.

And now HORR has the nerve to announce that he contemplates running for the United States Senate against Mr. JONES.

He is an opportunist, pure and simple, and believes, with a certain species of cleverness, that he should grasp his political tide while it seems on the flood. In this forthcoming contest for the Senate the voters who once supported him will have given them a splendid chance to correct their former error and retire him to private life, where he should thereafter be kept retired, since he is certainly no adornment for them or the State of Washington, or proof of their sagacity in selecting him to go there.

His attitude in support of prohibition repeal is not in consideration here, either for or against. But his reception of the President's hospitality, just one instance of several demonstrating his congressional unfitness, is the most glaring to date. His constituents may expect it to be followed by other breaches, as it seems that he is the sort of unstable and unfitted public official in whom his constituency can find safety only through permanent retirement.

Mr. BLANTON. That paper out there ought to be fair. It ought to have been fair enough to the gentleman to have stated that if the President had not talked to him until 3 o'clock a. m., our friend might have flown to Seattle in a Government plane in time to have changed the action of the State convention. He did not change it. The next time I hope he will not talk to the President so long. What were you talking about that night, Ralph? [Laughter and applause.] But being always just, I must be fair to the President, who, if nothing else, is most kind and courteous to all new, inexperienced, young members of his own party. The President has a custom of adding three novices to his list when inviting the old-timers to dine. He takes the youngsters down the line alphabetically. It so happened that on that night he had reached the "Ho's" in the novices. So it happened that he invited ROBERT L. HOGG, PEHR G. HOLMES, and RALPH A. HORR. The President really meant to feed them. He did not intend to talk to them. Yet our friend unkindly charges that he was called there to keep him away from Seattle.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman insinuating that the President called him away purposely?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. That is what the gentleman himself stated, as I have used the exact report of his interview in my remarks. But it will be worth the money to our friend. He will never let them get him up into the air again at 3 a. m. in a Government plane controlled by the President, whose plans he voted against.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were ayes 0 and noes 75.

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone, including the following: Compensation of all officials and employees; foreign and domestic newspapers and periodicals; law books not exceeding $1,000; textbooks and books of reference; printing and binding, including printing of annual report; rent and personal services in the District of Columbia; purchase or exchange of typewriting, adding, and other machines; purchase or exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles; claims for damages to vessels passing through the locks of the Panama Canal, as authorized by the Panama Canal act; claims for losses of or damages to property arising from the conduct of authorized business operations; claims for damages to property arising from the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal; acquisition of land and land under water, as authorized in the Panama Canal act; expenses incurred in assembling, assorting, storing, repairing, and selling material, machinery, and equipment heretofore or hereafter purchased or acquired for the construction of the Panama Canal which are unserviceable or no longer needed, to be reimbursed from the proceeds of such sales; expenses incident to conducting hearings and examining estimates for appropriations on the Isthmus; expenses incident to any emergency arising because of calamity by flood, fire, pestilence, or like character not foreseen or otherwise provided for herein; traveling expenses, when prescribed by the Governor of the Panama Canal to persons engaged in field work or traveling on official business; and for such other expenses not in the United States as the Governor of the Panama Canal may deem necessary best to promote the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal, all to be expended under the direction of the Governor of the Panama Canal and accounted for as follows:

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it is now quite apparent that as we draw to the end of this bill there will be no material reductions in the appropriations provided by this bill. If there were to be any reductions in any part of the bill as printed, of course, they would come in some of these later appropriations. Obviously, they would come from rivers and harbors and the flood-control appropriations. The House has turned down any reductions in those two appropriations. Therefore, I give up in despair of having any economy read into this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman realize there will be a roll-call vote shortly?

Mr. McGUGIN. I shall be glad to have a roll call. I can think of nothing that would please me more, especially in line with the statement made by my friend from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, than that there would be a roll call on the rivers and harbors appropriation, and I would ask for no greater favor than to have the opportunity to have it written into the RECORD that I voted for a reduction in the rivers and harbors appropriation.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Have we not been compelled to meet this threat from the chairman all the way through these appropriation bills?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. I do not yield to the gentleman or anybody else.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman live far away from rivers and harbors?

Mr. McGUGIN. The committee has asked us to take a reduction in the national defense. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] has spoken to the effect that we do not need so much preparation. The gentleman said something about the fact that some 4,000,000 men were, not so long ago, 13 years ago, discharged from the Army after their experience in the World War. They are 13 years older to-day than they were then. They did a good job saving this Nation once in its hour of peril.

Certainly as the years go by we can not call upon that generation to do the job again.

This country has been unprepared for every war we have fought. We have not fought a war without losing thousands of men who were not prepared for war. Some 10 or 15 years before the World War started, a great Democrat started the cry, "In the event of war a million men will spring to arms overnight." Oh, that was popular then in the days of peace, but that kind of psychology kept this country from being prepared, and when 4,000,000 men went into the Army, thousands were killed or injured because they were not prepared and because they had not had a fair chance to be prepared.

Pardon the reference as far as my own military experience is concerned. I do not claim to be either a hero or a martyr. I spent most of my time at Brest. I saw thousands and thousands of men pass through that camp. I came in contact with many who had been in the Army less than a month. I saw men leaving Brest to go to the front as replacements who had never shouldered a gun. Many of these men were killed because they did not know how to take care of themselves, and their blood is upon the hands of America, because they were sent into war without being given a chance for their lives.

All we have left in our national defense act is reserve officers, the citizens' military training camps, and the National Guard. If we are to depend upon a civilian army, we should give it a fair chance.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I can not yield.

As to the reserve officers who go to camp this summer you do not wish to pay them a fair salary. I know the Government of the United States is hard up, but it is not so hard up that it can not pay its honest debts. Why do you want these men to go to camp and not be paid their fair salary? You say you will give them a dollar a day and their living, but as officers they have to buy their own uniforms. Others working for the Government are not working for nothing, just because the Government is hard up. I have observed that this political Congress will not vote for a fair reduction of 11 per cent of that part of salaries over $1,000 of others on the pay roll. That kind of just economy would have saved tens of millions of dollars. Yet to-day we are asked to compel patriotic reserve officers to sacrifice their just salaries and thereby save a million or two. The reason for this disgusting conduct on the part of Congress is that there are not many voters among the reserve officers while there are hundreds of thousands of voters on the general pay roll.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in reply to my good friend from Kansas, and for the enlightenment of the House, I read the following:

Army officers and reserve officers have been filling the halls and galleries of the House of Representatives during the past 10 days. And every mail has brought hundreds of letters for Members of Congress, urging them not to abolish the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps. The letters were first sent to all Reserve Officers' Training Corps college boys to pass on to parents and friends, to forward back to Representatives.

As a result a considerable body of House Members decided that Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps and the citizens' military training camps must not be abolished, even in this year of severe financial difficulty.

To-day they will decide whether the money for these vacation camps for sons of well-to-do families shall be saved at the expense of the poorest and neediest people in the country. They will vote on postponing $10,000,000 worth of river and harbor work, and $8,000,000 worth of flood-control work which the House Appropriations Committee left in the War Department bill because it will provide work for thousands of men desperately in need of that work.

Of all economies proposed to a reluctant Congress the proposal to suspend for a year the summer camps heretofore provided by the Government for college boys and a carefully selected group of other young men was the most reasonable.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps boys are junior and senior college students. If they are seniors, they have already had one summer camp. If they are juniors, they will have an opportunity to go to camp next year. Their status as reserve officers will not be altered in the least if they do not go to camp this year.

But a majority of the House membership voted Tuesday to provide this 42-day outing for some 7,200 college boys, together with 70 cents a day pay and subsistence. They voted to provide a 30-day outing for 37,500 other boys, the great majority of whom go to camp for a year, or perhaps two, and make no effort to complete the course which will make them reserve officers. They voted, also, to pay members of the Organized Reserves at the rate officers of the Regular Army are paid, instead of letting them go to camp this year with nothing but $1 a day from the Government.

They overturned the Appropriations Committee on these matters in spite of the fact that all civilian departments of Government have been cut even more drastically than the committees recommended, and in spite of the fact that corresponding training courses in the Navy have been suspended.

So far, President Hoover, who could control the activities of the military gentlemen that forced this remarkable about face, has not rebuked them. It is time he did so and did it publicly. He should do it before the final vote is taken by the House on this question.

Mr. Chairman, that is an editorial printed in the Washington Daily News of to-day, May 19, 1932. I think it clearly presents to this House the questions upon which we will be called upon to vote in a few minutes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. I wish to say that my stand on this matter goes back to a year or a year and a half ago when the gentlewoman from Montana, the first Congresswoman, Miss Rankin, came to your office and to my office, and to the office of every Congressman asking for the elimination of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, and every cadet activity in every high school in the United States. This was pacificism of the first water, and is what caused me to believe we should provide for these activities.

Mr. BYRNS. Miss Rankin did the gentleman an honor she did not confer upon me. This does not eliminate these camps. It only cuts them out for one year. There is no question involved in this. No one has ever considered me to be a pacifist.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman would not want to blame me for having heard the generals or criticize me for having heard them.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not criticizing anyone. I have read the editorial. I do not seek to make any personal application. Let each gentleman apply it to his own position upon the question. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal: Salary of the governor, $10,000; purchase, inspection, delivery, handling, and storing of materials, supplies, and equipment for issue to all departments of the Panama Canal, the Panama Railroad, other branches of the United States Government, and for authorized sales; payment in lump sums of not exceeding the amounts authorized by the injury compensation act approved September 7, 1916 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 793), to alien cripples who are now a charge upon the Panama Canal by reason of injuries sustained while employed in the construction of the Panama Canal; for continuing the construction for the Madden Dam across the Chagres River at Alhajuela for the storage of water for use in the maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, together with a hydroelectric plant, roadways, and such other work as in the judgment of the Governor of the Panama Canal may be necessary, to cost in the aggregate not to exceed $15,500,000; in all, $9,091,011, together with all moneys arising from the conduct of business operations authorized by the Panama Canal act.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: On page 76, line 17, after the word "act," insert: "and such sums, aggregating not to exceed $3,500,000, as may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as dividends by the Panama Railroad Co. in excess of 10 per cent of the capital stock of such company."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain what this means?

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order until the explanation is made.

Mr. TABER. I think if the gentleman wants to make a point of order, it ought to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the point of order comes too late.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there has been no debate.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet endeavoring to reserve a point of order when the gentleman from Wisconsin reserved his point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there has been no discussion of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear any point of order made or reserved.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the gentleman from Wisconsin turned to the gentleman from Mississippi and said to the gentleman, "Explain what this means." That is debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not deny making that statement.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet endeavoring to reserve a point of order at the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there has been no discussion, and the uniform ruling has been that if there has been no discussion a point of order is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi yielded to the gentleman from New York. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order comes too late.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee is entitled to an explanation of this situation. Mr. Chairman, the committee has recommended a cut of $3,500,000 in the appropriation for the completion of the Madden Dam at the Panama Canal. The total amount that is to be spent upon this project has been authorized and contracted for, and there will be required to meet the contract payments in the fiscal year 1933 approximately $4,500,000. Out of that amount there is carried in this bill as it came from the committee $1,000,000. The committee figured that the balance of $3,500,000 could be provided out of the funds of the Panama Railroad. The Panama Railroad unquestionably has some surplus funds that can be used for General Treasury purposes, but it has no legal authority to spend money to build the Madden Dam. The only way those funds could be used would be by the Panama Railroad declaring a dividend, paying it into the Treasury, and its being used in that way.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi has offered an amendment which permits dividends that are declared by the Panama Railroad in excess of the regular 10 per cent dividends upon the stock, which is paid into the Treasury and is included in the Treasury estimates of receipts, to be used for the purpose of paying for this contract authorization. Frankly, I have doubts as to whether or not the railroad corporation will be able to declare $3,500,000 in addition to the regular 10 per cent, or $700,000. At the same time they are in a position where they can declare a very substantial proportion of it.

Perhaps a thorough investigation of the situation will reveal that the whole amount can be declared. I have made this statement rather than some member of the committee, because I have the misfortune of being a director of the Panama Railroad and, perhaps, know a little more about the details.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This would not be taken from the fund for ship replacement?

Mr. TABER. No; it would be taken from some other replacement fund which we have no idea of using. For instance, there was a barge-replacement fund, and the barges have been abandoned, and other replacement funds on activities which have been abandoned, like the renewal of the coal trestle at Colon. We would not affect the steamship-rebuilding fund in this way. Frankly, I question whether we can go as far as the $3,500,000 which is suggested here; but if we can not, it will simply have to be taken care of in a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. No appropriation under the Department of War available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other civil position under the War Department: Provided, That from the date of this act to and including June 30, 1933, payment for personal services made in accordance herewith shall constitute payment in full for such services. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment striking out the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Beginning on page 78, line 11, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, may I state to the chairman of the subcommittee that we had a vote on this section on the Post Office and Treasury appropriation, and thereafter when the matter came up in the next appropriation bill the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] announced to the House that if this section were finally stricken from any bill he would consent to striking it from the other bills. The Department of the Interior bill has stricken from it this particular section; and when the Navy appropriation bill came before the House, I made a motion to strike out, and it was consented to. I think, in keeping with this action, the section should also go out.

Mr. COLLINS. I shall respect any agreement that the chairman of this committee has made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes; and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment except in cases of medical officers on out-patient medical service and except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary and then only as to such latter cases when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicle for official use of the Secretary of War, and no other persons connected with the War Department or the Military Establishment, except medical officers on out-patient medical service, shall have a Government-owned motor vehicle assigned for their exclusive use.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the number of this section may be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, in a few minutes this bill, as amended, will be reported to the House. The Committee of the Whole has added to this bill on account of the so-called civil components a total of $5,794,165. That is the record that has been made for economy. The economy bill left this House practically stripped, and upon its heels we find this measure reduced by 20 per cent below the total amount by which the Appropriations Committee proposed to reduce the Budget estimate as a part of the general retrenchment program.

It is my purpose, when we get into the House, to ask for a record vote on each of the amendments contributing to that increase. I can not believe that the Members of this House, with unemployment nation-wide, with business paralyzed, with Federal revenues so low as to make necessary virtually a war-time tax measure, will, by their vote, impose this additional burden upon the people.

What are these propositions?

First. You will be asked to vote upon whether or not we shall expend $2,109,768 to give active-duty training, with pay, to 19,000 men attached to the Officers' Reserve Corps; men, gentlemen, I dare say practically without exception, who are engaged in some gainful pursuit; men who for the most part are connected with business houses and industrial plants that have been besieging this Congress to economize—to balance the Budget; and yet the proponents of this amendment would have you believe that these men must be assured of compensation before they will engage in active-duty training. It is an insult to the patriotism of such men.

I wonder just how many of the 19,000 actually have expressed personal opposition to the action proposed by the committee; and I wonder also, gentlemen, just how many of the 19,000 actually know just exactly what the committee's proposal is. Much misinformation is abroad. I was told yesterday by a Member that he had received a wire from a college president, if you please, urging him to oppose the proposal to abolish the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. That college president did not assume any such thing. I maintain that he has been deliberately misinformed, and these telegrams that are coming in here, which seem to frighten so many of you, are inspired by that sort of propaganda. And let me remind you that the great mass of people who are asking for relief, who are asking for employment—yes; who even are begging for food—can not send you telegrams; they have no paid representatives here in Washington who are also working for their own selfish interests; they are looking to you and to me. We are not the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States. We are the association of the rank and file of the people of these United States, and I suspect that that will be rather forcibly impressed upon us before we are convened again in regular session.

The second proposition you will be asked to vote upon is whether or not you will add $1,080,773 to this bill for sending approximately 7,200 college boys to camp for 42 days during the next fiscal year. College boys, gentlemen. Think of it! And not only to send them to these camps, pay their transportation, but to subsist them, provide them with medical care, and what else? Pay them cash at the rate of 70 cents per day, or approximately $30, for the privilege of going. The proposition is preposterous in times like these.

The committee's provision does not in any way, shape, or form disturb their school training. We provide the money for uniforms, we provide the money for instructors and equipment, and we provide the money for actually paying these students 30 cents a day for the last two years of their college courses. The boys who graduate in June have been to one camp. The boys who finish their third year in June will have an opportunity to go to camp at the close of their senior year, and from this very date until that time they will continue to draw from the Government 30 cents a day. And gentlemen tell us that it will cripple our national defense if these young men, who have had either three or four years of instruction in military tactics, do not go to camp next year. If you do not vote this amendment down, I will tell you what you will impair. You will impair the faith of the American people in the good judgment of this Congress to deal with the present emergency.

Lastly, you will be asked to vote upon whether or not you will add $2,603,624 to this bill for the conduct of the citizens' military training camps. I have given you the opinion of the former Chief of Staff, General Summerall, as to this activity. I have told you that the present adjutant general of the Army, General Bridges, has said that it might be dispensed with for one or two years without doing any harm. I have not told you before that an officer of the General Staff submitted to a member of this committee a list of suggested reductions in this bill aggregating $10,000,000, which included the suspension of this activity.

Now, it is just a question of whether or not we will save $2,603,624 on this activity alone, or, contrary to the judgment of these military men, spend that amount to send 37,500 boys, mostly in their teens, to camp for 30 days, not primarily to train them as soldiers, but to improve them physically and to instruct them in citizenship. Better would we expend that amount in helping the physical condition of those who are hungry, and in raising the confidence of those whose faith in their Government has been shaken through long deprivation. You will find but precious few of the sons of these unfortunates in the citizens' military training camps.

Mr. Chairman, unrest stalks abroad. Some would have you believe that these civil items are essential to the national defense. Do they mean from within? Certainly they can not mean from without. National defense, my friends, does not entirely mean a man who has been taught to obey orders or tote a gun.

A healthy, happy citizenry is the very foundation of national defense. You will not promote it by sustaining these amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the bill in its present state provides for the retirement of 2,000 officers of the Regular Army, as proposed by the committee. Whether or not an effort will be made in the House to keep the commissioned strength of the Regular Army at its present number, I am not advised, but I shall take advantage of this opportunity to read a letter that came to me this morning from an active commissioned officer of the Regular Army. It is deserving of the attention and consideration of every man here. It reads as follows:

I am a Regular Army captain and also, I believe, a loyal and patriotic citizen. What is more, I am a taxpayer.

I like the Army; I believe in it, and yet I am not blinded to the fact that 2,000 officers can be removed from it without decreasing our national defense one iota. In fact, it is evident to me that, if it were possible to remove 4,000 of the most ineffective officers, the present work of handling Regular troops and instructing the civilian components could be handled just as effectively and, of course, more efficiently by the remaining 8,000.

I am prompted to write by the barrage of such talk as "hamstringing national defense," "wrecking the Army" and the like. We who are engaged in the workaday jobs of the Army know what nonsense this is. Whether the high Army officials and others who shape our policies know this, is problematical. When they inspect us everything is rehearsed ahead of time; they see only what they are supposed to see and are told what they want to be told; they deal with the Army in theory more than in fact.

Would it be hamstringing the national defense because 8,000 officers would be required to do efficiently what 12,000 officers are now puttering around with? No; because these 8,000 will be and will have to be more efficient. The 4,000 would not be exiled or suddenly exterminated. They would still be available for emergency; in return for retired pay they could be required to keep fit and to be periodically mobilized and trained a couple of weeks per year if desired, like reserve officers. Many business organizations have cut out overhead personnel and deadwood and increased production.

Will it wreck the Army if 100 "gilded aides" (private secretaries) have to be put to military work; if 100 post-exchange officers (small-town storekeepers) on posts now adequately served by civilian stores and markets are put back into military productivity; if several hundred property officers now counting socks and ash cans (the work of an $1,800 bonded stock clerk) go back to the work of military training; if 100 broken-down colonels puttering around corps-area headquarters while juniors do their work are put on the retired list, where they should have gone years ago; if several hundred officers sitting around offices in Federal buildings of every large city, sending out mimeographed pep bulletins and getting up smokers for reserve officers are put to constructive military work?

Is it going to wreck the Reserve Officers' Training Corps if Purdue University, now having 14 Regular Army officers of Field Artillery, is cut down to 4 Field Artillery officers? Has not every officer in the Army heard the customary remark about the Reserve Officers' Training Corps detail at this college or that school, "The 4-year rest up at Blank University"?

The fact that pacifists are in favor of this reduction means nothing; the reduction will strengthen rather than weaken our defense. There is nothing so weakening to defense as having a large number of officers puttering around, holding meaningless jobs, and making useless motions. The reduction will mean that our top-heavy list of senior officers who, because of their rank, now consider themselves "done with detail," will have to forget their slogan and get back to arduous military duties again.

No more will we see a colonel commanding a second lieutenant and 20 men on a caretaking job, or twenty-odd officers on a post with but 150 men, or 25 officers of field grade on a post of 2,500 men, or two companies fully officered but with so few men that they are combined as one for drill each day, while on alternate days one batch of officers twiddle their thumbs.

I believe you are right about the value of the National Guard. I have been on duty with units of it in Massachusetts and Illinois. I firmly believe that the average National Guard officer, in these States at least, is further along in the technical knowledge of his branch of the service than is the Regular Army officer. We spend so much time checking property, sitting on boards and courts, running post exchanges and movie shows, policing up the post, acting as office manager and private secretary, acting as adjutant or executive for some "done-with-detail" superior, that we are lucky if we are able to spend on technical advancement the one night per week usually spent by the guard officer.

I believe this bill is going to have a rejuvenating effect on the Army, but as long as the reduction is going to be on the basis of selection according to efficiency, why not go all the way and insure future efficiency by making subsequent promotions a matter of selection? The majority of Army officers, due to war entry, are a homogeneous mass as far as length of service is concerned. Majors and first lieutenants differ in length of service only by a few months in many cases; consequently length of service has ceased to have value as a gage of ability. No doubt favoritism would creep in, but nine out of ten aggressive and capable officers would take their chances on favoritism for the opportunity of rising by merit. I should have said the younger officers would prefer this; the older ones whose efficiency is no longer increasing at the same rate naturally would not want the risk of being passed over. Regardless of the dangers of selection, the good officer would on the average tend to rise to the top.

I am conscious of the courage and good sense of the backers of this bill, in spite of the cries of "pacifist" and "politics." May all Government departments be snapped out of their lethargy by the same drastic methods.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

I recall when the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill was up the gentleman from Mississippi offered a motion which limited the amount that might be paid for any passenger-carrying vehicle to $750, and said he would offer the amendment in respect of all the other appropriation bills. It does not seem to be in this particular bill, and I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. COLLINS. That is because we do not carry any money for passenger-carrying vehicles here.

Mr. JONES. There is no conflict between those bills and the bill under consideration, and the gentleman has not abandoned his position of economy in that respect?

Mr. COLLINS. No, indeed. The bill would have carried a similar provision had the bill made provision for passenger-carrying motor vehicles.

Mr. JONES. And the gentleman still intends to have that apply to all bills in which there is provision made for new cars?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if the section just read is carried in all the other bills as it is in this bill? I understood it had gone out of one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. COLLINS. The other bills carry the $750 limitation except the Navy bill, and I understand there were no purchase items for passenger-carrying automobiles in the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. GOSS. What about the use of such automobiles? We are restricting the use of them in this provision.

Mr. COLLINS. The provision that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is referring to is a provision that affects the purchase of new cars.

Mr. GOSS. But I am referring to section 3, which has just been numbered 2, starting at line 15, page 79, and going over to line 6, on page 80; and if my recollection serves me correctly, this provision was omitted from the Navy bill.

Mr. COLLINS. It is the same provision, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman assures us it was carried in the other bill?

Mr. COLLINS. It was carried in the Navy bill.

Mr. JONES. And there is no distinction made so far as the purchase of any cars is concerned?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

Mr. JONES. I am interested in practicing economy in government in every possible way. I have in my hand a wire signed by a number of the citizens of my home town, and which I have asked to have read to the House. I have called its substance to your attention heretofore. In this message these citizens plead that the Budget be balanced by reducing expenses instead of further increasing the terrific burden of taxation. that the Members reduce their own salaries and abolish any and all unnecessary expenses, that they refuse to listen to small minority groups, and that they vote in the interest of the people of the whole country. This is the sentiment expressed throughout the land.

I have voted for the economy program right down the line. I have not only voted for the reductions offered, but have offered a number of additional amendments making further reductions. Some of these votes were not easy to cast, but I feel that during these times this is the wise course.

Much of the criticism of Congress is justified. I think, however, it is but fair to add that the Congress has reduced every appropriation bill not only much below last year's appropriation, but also below the requests made by the President through the Bureau of the Budget. They reduced the agriculture appropriation bill $10,000,000 below the President's request; the Commerce bill $5,500,000 below his request; the Treasury and Post Office bills $22,700,000 below his request; the Navy bill $15,000,000; the War Department bill $24,000,000, and the Interior bill $6,000,000 below his request, and other bills in similar proportions, a total of $161,000,000 below what the President asked for in his Budget, and $563,000,000 below last year's appropriations for the same purposes.

I think Congress made a mistake in taking so many items out of the economy bill, but I believe this will be corrected. This was a special bill for additional reductions; that is, in addition to those mentioned above. I not only voted for these reductions but sought to include further ones. One thing that made this difficult was the fact that the members of the President's Cabinet so often protested against the reductions proposed in their respective departments.

The economy bill as it passed the House provides for an 11 per cent reduction in the salaries of the Members of Congress. I voted for the amendment which would have made this reduction 25 per cent on salaries of over $8,000, including Members of Congress. I felt and now feel that during these serious times everyone should be willing to make a sacrifice.

I thought it proper to call these facts to the attention of those who might be interested, because the action of the House on the economy bill has in some instances caused the public to lose sight of the actual reductions that have been made. The records will show these facts as indisputable.

I am glad to see the public interest that is being manifested in reducing the expenses of government. It is highly important that the centralization in government should be halted, that the manifold activities of government should be curtailed. I do not care who gets the credit, just so we get economy.

WILLIAM WOLFF SMITH

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order for the purpose of making an announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I have just received a letter from the Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau to the effect that he has accepted the resignation of William Wolff

Smith as special counsel for the Veterans' Bureau, effective immediately after the expiration of his annual leave. [Applause.]

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BARBOUR: On page 54, in line 5, strike out "$4,244,580" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,354,348"; and on page 52, line 11, strike out the comma at the end of the line; and in line 12 strike out the words "except as hereinafter provided"; and on page 54 strike out the paragraph commencing in line 23 and ending in line 11 on page 55.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GIFFORD, is absent. If present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I can not qualify; but if permitted to vote, I would vote "aye."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] is unavoidably absent; if present, he would vote "aye" on the three amendments that have been voted upon.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BARBOUR. In its present form, I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is any gentleman opposed to the bill in its entirety?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to certain features of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not give the gentleman from Texas any priority over the gentleman from California. If any Member of the House is opposed to the bill in its entirety, he is entitled to preference.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill. I voted against every amendment, and I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California qualifies.

The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARBOUR moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendments:

Page 10, line 15, commencing with the colon, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Page 8, line 19, strike out "$27,209,927" and insert "$31,833,427."

Page 8, line 23, strike out "$8,356,200" and insert "$8,545,011."

Page 9, line 4, strike out "$1,914,948" and insert "$9,447,323."

Page 9, line 14, strike out "$4,648,006" and insert "$6,281,824."

Page 9, line 15, strike out "$5,122,479" and insert "$5,928,389."

Page 10, line 1, strike out "$132,457,790" and insert "$136,242,204."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the motion is not in order, that the House has already voted on the proposal submitted to the House by the gentleman from California and adopted by the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the McSwain amendment was adopted in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as a part of a paragraph. The McSwain amendment has been voted upon by the House of Representatives since the committee has risen. It has become a part and parcel of the bill by action of the House.

The gentleman from California now seeks to change the provision by adopting only a portion of the paragraph which contains the McSwain amendment and not all of the paragraph, and to that extent the motion to recommit of the gentleman from California is out of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the proposed amendment, which is made up of quite a number of items, changes the items which were included by virtue of the McSwain amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It eliminates the McSwain amendment along with other provisions of the bill.

The Chair will hear the gentleman from California on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask further if it changes all of the provisions of the McSwain amendment or only a portion of them?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the McSwain amendment, even though it is adopted by the House, again read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the McSwain amendment will be again read.

Answering the gentleman's further parliamentary inquiry, the proposed motion to recommit eliminates from the bill the McSwain amendment along with other provisions in those paragraphs to which the McSwain amendment was adopted as a perfecting amendment.

Mr. CANNON. The entire McSwain amendment, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; the Chair has answered that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is made because of that proposed action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

If there is no objection on the part of the House, the Chair will direct that the McSwain amendment be read. There was a request that such be done.

Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the McSwain amendment is long and involved, and it would be very difficult for the House to follow it. Everybody knows what it is. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, a motion to recommit is a direction to the committee having had the bill in charge to report the bill back to the House with certain amendments. The amendments which are thus reported back to the House by the committee stand exactly upon the same footing as any other amendment offered to a bill and passed upon either by the House or by the Committee of the Whole.

In the present case the McSwain amendment, so-called, was adopted, beginning in line 11, page 11, with the word "convene," and was a perfecting amendment to the language which it is proposed by the motion to recommit to strike out. A motion to strike out is always in order following a perfecting amendment. In fact, the perfecting amendment must have consideration before the motion to strike out is voted upon.

I submit to the Chair that this is not the ordinary case where it is sought to get further action by the House upon an amendment which has already been adopted by seeking to strike out that amendment itself or by seeking to amend such an amendment. But, as I have stated, this is a motion to strike out the text of the bill, together with the perfecting amendment, which, of course, was adopted both by the Committee of the Whole and by the House before the motion to strike out would have been in order.

The remaining language in the motion, I will say to the Chair, can not be involved in any objection because it merely proposes to increase amounts of appropriation which are already in the bill and were not changed by amendments in the Committee of the Whole or in the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the so-called McSwain amendment provides the machinery to carry out the specific mandate of the bill. Every Member of the House was fully protected on a motion to recommit, particularly the gentleman from California. Had he asked for a separate vote on the McSwain amendment, and if the separate vote had been voted down, then he could carry out his purpose by a motion to recommit to increase the appropriations in order to avoid the discharge of 2,000 officers. But the McSwain amendment was approved by the House; it was adopted by the House when the Speaker submitted all of the amendments en gros, and therefore, what the gentleman from California is now seeking to do is to make another appeal to the House and have the House reverse itself on something upon which it has just voted. Whether it is a part of the entire motion to recommit or not is not controlling if it is an integral part of a specific proposition. For instance, without the McSwain amendment, Mr. Speaker, the existing number of officers could be left intact, even though we did not appropriate sufficiently for them. That is not the gist of it. What the gentleman from California seeks to do, under his motion to recommit, is to strike from the bill the elimination of 2,000 officers. I submit that the motion to recommit is not in order because the means whereby these officers may be eliminated have been adopted by the House. As I said before, the gentleman from California could have obtained a separate vote on that, and had the House voted that out of the bill, then his motion to recommit would have been in order, but under the parliamentary situation, the House having passed upon that part of the bill he can not now attempt to reverse the action of the House by a motion to recommit. The point of order should be sustained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The Chair regrets that he was not here during the consideration of this bill, but was presiding over the Ways and Means Committee and, therefore, is not familiar with what took place in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the bill was being considered. The Chair has tried to acquaint himself as best he could in the last few moments with what transpired.

The Chair is advised that in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a perfecting amendment was adopted to the paragraph known as the McSwain amendment. The bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the House, the House has agreed to the amendments, and has ordered the bill engrossed and read a third time.

The question is whether a motion to recommit, as offered by the gentleman from California, is in order which seeks to change something that the House has agreed to.

The motion to recommit was placed in the rule to give a substantial privilege to the minority of the House—I do not mean any political minority but a minority of the House—so as to give them a chance to go on record as to legislation.

In the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there is no roll-call vote, so that the only opportunity that a minority may have to go on record is by means of a motion to recommit in the House. If the motion to recommit of the gentleman from California sought simply to eliminate from the bill the McSwain amendment, it would not be in order, because the question of estoppel would apply. When the House has acted on a matter, it must be res adjudicata. However, as the Chair understands the proposition, the McSwain amendment was adopted as a perfecting amendment to the paragraph. The motion to recommit of the gentleman from California proposes to strike out a substantial portion of the paragraph comprehending the McSwain amendment. Under the general rules of the House, where a motion is made to strike out a paragraph, a perfecting amendment changing the paragraph is preferential and the vote is first taken on the perfecting amendment. If the perfecting amendment is adopted, then it is in order to move to strike out the entire paragraph, notwithstanding the House or the committee has adopted a perfecting amendment to the paragraph.

The Chair thinks that the same rule applies to a motion to recommit where it is proposed in such a motion to strike out a paragraph or a portion of a paragraph which may have been perfected by amendments.

The Chair is therefore constrained to rule that the point of order is not good, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute motion to recommit.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California did not move the previous question, and the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Undoubtedly, if the previous question had been moved and sustained, no substitute motion to recommit would be in order, but the previous question was not moved, and the gentleman from Texas is within his parliamentary rights.

The Clerk will report the substitute motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit by Mr. BLANTON: Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendments, to-wit: On page 16, line 4, before the period, insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for or on account of any expense incident to the permanent change of station of any commissioned officer of the Army except (1) officers appointed to and relieved from positions that are filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, (2) officers detailed to and from Army schools as students, (3) military attachés, (4) officers ordered to and from duty in the Canal Zone and in the Philippines, and (5) officers ordered to replace officers who die or may be separated from the active list."

On page 15, line 20, strike out "$4,126,865" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,126,865."

On page 52, line 10, before the word "Members," insert "not to exceed 10,000."

On page 56, line 23, after the word "instruction," insert "not to exceed 36,000."

Mr. BLANTON. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the substitute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question on his substitute motion and on the original motion of the gentleman from California; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] makes a point of order against the substitute of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the rule of practice and procedure and decorum which has been established by the Speaker of the House that the Chair will not recognize anyone in the well of the House; and I will say for that reason——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not consider that point. The present Speaker pro tempore has made no such ruling.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the points of order: First, that the motion to recommit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] as a substitute for the motion to recommit of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is not germane to the motion of the gentleman from California; secondly, that it contains legislative matter which is not in order upon an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair does not feel compelled to pass on the question of whether the substitute of the gentleman from Texas is germane to the original motion to recommit of the gentleman from California or not. The gentleman from California made a motion to recommit dealing with certain features of the bill. The previous question was not ordered. The gentleman from Texas has offered a substitute with instructions as to other features of the bill, and the Chair thinks it is clearly within the province of the House to pass on which one of the motions to recommit they desire to pass upon and will, of course, have a chance to pass on both of them. If the Blanton amendment as a substitute is adopted for the Barbour motion to recommit, that would eliminate the instructions in the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], and the question would come as to whether the House desired to adopt the instruction of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the Chair rule on the point of order as to the motion containing legislative matter on an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no point of order made on that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I made that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; I made that point of order, and I thought I had made it quite distinctly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon, but he did not hear that part of his point of order. The Chair will say, as he caught the reading of the motion to recommit, the legislative part of it is a limitation.

Mr. BLANTON. It is both a limitation and comes within the Holman rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is a limitation, and the question is on the motion to recommit by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on both motions to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question of ordering the yeas and nays was taken and 47 Members arose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty-seven Members have arisen, and it requires, according to the last vote, 77. The Constitution provides for one-fifth of the Members present. Forty-seven is not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 90 ayes and 200 noes.

So the substitute motion to recommit was lost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to recommit by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 182, nays 202, not voting 49, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I hate war. I should like to see world disarmament. But I want it to be world disarmament with emphasis on the word "world." I do not believe in destroying our national defense and allowing the rest of the world to be armed. I do not believe in any nation having a greater army than our own—in any nation having a more effective army than our own. We have been very magnanimous it seems to me. We have reduced our Army and Navy since the World War below treaty strength. The other nations have not.

I favor a citizens' army, an army built in time of trouble around trained officers. That is why I favor leaving in this bill every appropriation for the citizens' military training camp, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the training of reserve officers.

During the last war we commissioned many officers whose only qualifications were an A. B. or B. S. degree. They were wonderful boys. Some of them could do logarithms in their heads; but that knowledge is not sufficient to make an officer. The ability to find the cube root of a barrel of pork or find the longitude west of Greenwich does not help a man to keep his head and handle men under fire or even on the parade ground. It does not teach him how to train others to do squads right, to shoot, or to take down and set up a machine gun under difficulties.

The military science is an exact science. One that does not permit of mistakes. Mistakes do not mean merely a money loss. Military mistakes mean death to men. In Italy, according to the press some months ago, each boy in the schools is required at the age of 7 to begin training with a wooden replica of the army rifle. If you abolish the citizens' military training camps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, you are going to send our boys out to fight against boys trained from the age of 7. Boys without training you are going to send forth to be crucified on the altar of penuriousness.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], in his speech at the opening of this debate, told us that this was the richest Nation on earth. He should know. He has been here in this House many years. He has been chairman of the Appropriations Committee. He is so important that he could take the floor and state to this House that he spoke for the President of these United States. I think we can take his word that we are the richest Nation in the world. If we are the richest Nation we are being meanly penurious in taking from our boys this training that may in the future save their lives on the field of battle.

As a Nation, with the exception of a few religious sects and certain organizations of pacifists, we hold that the obligation to bear arms in defense of the Nation goes hand in hand with the obligation of citizenship. If it does, then there is an obligation on the part of the Nation to train the youth to arms. We are to a certain extent fulfilling that obligation through these two arms created in the national defense act.

It is the European plan that the sons of the nobility, the aristocrats, the sons of wealth shall be officers, and the private shall come from the sons of the poor. My idea of an army is a democratic army. The European idea is that they must have a large standing army. The American plan is for a citizen army based on a nucleus of trained men, ready, willing, and capable of training others rapidly in time of war. The son of the farmer, of the laborer, of the section foreman—the capable intelligent youth whose only drawback is the lack of a college education—has as much right to be an officer as the son of a more fortunately situated parent. He may not be able to get the training in college to qualify him. He can get it in the citizens' military training camps and the schools of the Organized Reserve units. This vast majority of the boys of the Nation should not be discriminated against.

Last winter, at the suggestion of the President, Congress gave a moratorium of more than two hundred and fifty million to European nations. I voted against that measure. Those nations to whom we gave the moratorium were spending millions for armament. Every one of them was maintaining a larger land force than ours. Now we are trying to make up that loss of a quarter of a billion dollars through all kinds of so-called economy measures. The best economy would have been to have kept the money in the first place and not have contributed that amount to financing the armament of Europe.

I voted against that contribution to Europe, and I will not now favor making up the deficit so created by taking the amount from the Budget for our own national defense. I do not expect those nations whose armament we are financing through moratoriums to ever use that armament in our behalf. They may use it against us.

There are ways to cut the expenses without sacrificing national security in a time of world unrest. We have already cut it more than five hundred and sixty million under the amount that the President gave us in his Budget last December as the irreducible minimum and we will cut it more.

The private's life is at stake; he prefers to be led by a trained man, a man fully equipped, a man with a knowledge of the handling of troops and men and munitions, a man in whom he has confidence. He not only prefers it, he has a right to expect it. Congress can declare war. By a system of draft you gentlemen can force him into service whether he wants to go or not. But you have no right that you can justify, either by the rules of reason or law of rectitude, to send him into war untrained himself and under untrained officers. The only alternative to prevent the injustice is to provide sufficient money for our citizens' military training camps and Reserve Officers' Training Corps. Justice to the Nation and justice to the private both demand it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. BROWNING, for four days, on account of important business.

Mr. ESLICK, for the day, on account of illness.

Mr. KENNEDY, for the balance of the week, on account of important business.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

REREFERENCE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 11184 be rereferred to the Committee on Roads from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has given me authority to make this request, which is agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on Roads and to the ranking member of that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the bill was introduced, it was considered a private bill, having to do with a bridge across the St. Clair River at Port Huron, Mich. Since that time it has been determined to be of a quite general character. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTROLLED EXPANSION OF THE CURRENCY AND THE PAYMENT OF THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have placed on the Clerk's desk a motion to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of House Resolution 220, which provides a rule for the consideration of H. R. 7726, a bill providing for the expansion of the currency and the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. The Committee on Ways and Means made an adverse report on this bill. Thirteen members of that committee signed the adverse report and 11 members signed the minority report. The minority report contains a clear, logical and unanswerable argument in favor of the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. The report recommends that section 2 of H. R. 7726 be stricken out and the following amendment be substituted in lieu thereof:

SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act.

In the event that the purchasing power of the dollar in the wholesale commodity markets, as ascertained by the United States Department of Labor, shall at any time fall as much as 2 per cent below the average value of the year 1926, the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as may from time to time be necessary to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the normal standard of 1926.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be issued and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

The bonds will not be sold and will therefore not draw interest unless commodity prices return to the 1926 level. This section completely answers the argument of our opponents that we are proposing uncontrolled inflation. We are proposing controlled expansion of the currency.

I expect to follow the recommendation in the minority report. If 144 other Members of the House sign the motion to discharge the Rules Committee—53 have already signed—the rule will come up for consideration the second Monday in June, the 13th. If the rule is adopted by the House, four hours' debate will be allowed on the bill H. R. 7726, and then the bill will be read under the 5-minute rule and be subject to amendments. At that time I expect to offer the amendment to section 2 of the bill as proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means, and which is known as the Owen plan. I have prepared and introduced a bill which embodies this amendment. It is H. R. 11992, but consideration on this bill can not be forced, because it has been introduced less than 30 days. H. R. 11992 is the same as H. R. 1, with the Owen amendment added.

The Committee on Rules has before it our application for a favorable report on House Resolution 220. If a favorable report is made, we will get consideration much earlier than June 13. I do not believe the Members of Congress want to go back to their respective homes without making an effort to afford substantial relief to the plain people.

I hope every Member of the House will read the minority views of the members of the Ways and Means Committee. The committee hearings are also very interesting.

ADDRESS OF HON. S. D. M'REYNOLDS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered by my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS], over the radio last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by leave of the House, I incorporate as a part of my remarks a radio speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. S. D. MCREYNOLDS, whom we all know is one of the most able, earnest, and influential Members of the Congress in his advocacy of economy. As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I have had occasion to know of the value of his services along this line. The speech is as follows:

When Congress convened here in December we fully appreciated the serious condition confronting this country; and although the House was organized by the Democrats, speaking as one of them, it was our purpose to cooperate in every way possible with the administration in enacting that character of legislation which we thought would be beneficial to the country and relieve the most distressful conditions. Following that policy the moratorium resolution was passed at the request of the President. We have also passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, with an appropriation of $500,000,00, and with an expansion of some $2,000,000,000, which has been used, and is being used, for the purpose of stabilizing banks and railroads. Congress has also passed a hundred and twenty-five million dollar appropriation for the Federal land banks, which had for its purpose the right to grant extension of loans to farmers who had been unable to meet their obligations on account of the distressed condition throughout the country. But it seems that this has had but little effect.

Congress has also passed the Glass-Steagall bill, which, among other things, permits banks to take bonds, drawing interest, to the Federal reserve bank and issue currency for the face value thereof, with the proper discount charge. While it may be that these acts have been of some benefit in restoring confidence and maintaining our banking systems, yet a little, if any, has seeped down to the laboring or producing class, where prosperity must begin. Next came the tax measure, for which the House has been criticized very severely on account of our action thereon. This bill was reported as a nonpartisan measure and leaders on both sides of the House advocated the same. It provided for a general manufacturers' sales tax, to which many of us had been opposed in the House for many years, and I plead guilty to the charge of being one of the insurgents who aided in striking that measure from the bill. I have always believed that the tax burdens should fall heavier on those who are most able to pay. For many years there has been a strong fight made by certain interests to establish this form of taxation and thereby relieve the tax on incomes and inheritances. Naturally, it was the moneyed interests of this country who wished to shield themselves as much as possible in trying to procure this mode of taxation.

I opposed this manufacturers' sales tax because, first, if the tax could be passed on and was passed on to the purchaser, it would be paid by those least able to pay; second, there are thousands of manufacturing plants throughout this country who are merely battling for existence and who are patriotic enough to try to keep their men on the pay roll in order to support them and their families, although they are running in the red, who would not have been able, on account of very close competition, to have passed this tax on, and, therefore, would have had to close their plants and added thousands of others to the great army of unemployed throughout the United States. When we struck this sales tax from the tax bill we placed therein other articles of taxation that seemed to us just and fair, that would have raised the desired revenue for the purpose of balancing the Budget, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, with the saving of some $200,000,000 that has since passed the House.

The Members of the House fully appreciate the direful conditions existing in this country and the absolute necessity of cutting down expenses and economizing in every conceivable way that would not in any way interfere with the proper functions of the Government. Taking into consideration the economy bill, as passed by the House, and all other appropriations that have been made by the House, we have already reduced the appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 under that of 1932 nearly $620,000,000, and we are not through yet. This is something like $250,000,000 less than the President, through his Director of Budget, requested to be appropriated in his message to the House on December 7, 1931. In a statement made by the President in April, 1931, he did not at that time think that it would be necessary to even pass a tax bill during this session, although it was estimated that we would have a $900,000,000 deficit for the fiscal year ending 1931.

The public must understand, as shown by the President's message on May 5, that all reductions must come from a sum not exceeding $1,700,000,000; that the other appropriations are fixed charges. Since the President's message, in which he sent up his Director of Budget's report, he has asked for and secured $625,000,000 in appropriations which was not included in his Director of Budget's estimate at that time.

There has much appeared in the press about the House failing to pass the economy bill that was reported to the House. This Economy Committee deserved great credit in the untiring efforts that they made trying to bring out some bill that would mean many millions of savings to the Government. But so anxious were they to do this that they put items in this bill, to get them before the House, that were not agreed to by all members of that committee, and the result was that there was only one member of that committee, the chairman, who voted for and supported every measure therein contained.

For instance, while the committee reported consolidation of the Army and Navy, which it is admitted would have at least saved $25,000,000, and estimated by the author, the Hon. JOE BYRNS, to have saved from fifty to one hundred million dollars, was bitterly opposed by the administration, and when this bill was up for consideration, the President's own private secretary, known as his political secretary, an ex-Member of the House, was on the floor of the House buttonholing Members of his own party against that measure, and which resulted in its defeat. The Economy Committee recommended 11 per cent flat cut, over $1,000 exemption, of salaries, yet the administration and the Republican members of the Economy Committee fought this measure and undertook to substitute therefor what is known as the President's stagger plan. I merely recite these facts to show that there was no unanimity of action on the part of the committee or the administration in reference to all the items contained in this economy program. Personally, I voted for the consolidation of the Army and Navy, not only as a reduction of the expense of the Government but because I believe it would add to the efficiency and strength of our national defense.

I voted for the reduction of salaries; and after the committee had voted an exemption of $2,500, which I voted against, I offered an amendment providing that there should be a reduction in salaries of 11 per cent from $2,500 to $3,500, 15 per cent from $3,500 to $5,000, 20 per cent from $5,000 to $7,500, and 25 per cent over and above that amount. This was defeated. Congressional salaries were cut 11 per cent over an exemption of $2,500, but of course if my amendment had prevailed it would have been much more. I then thought, and still feel, that reduction in salaries should be greater in the higher brackets.

The President has complained that lobbyists have been in Washington "as thick as locusts." This may be true, and deserves the severest criticism, yet the same conditions existed when the Grundy tariff bill was passed in June, 1930, and which tariff bill has aided more in producing the distressful conditions in this country than any other act that has been passed by Congress in many years, yet we had no complaint from the Chief Executive at that time. Some two or three months ago the Expenditures Committee of the House had hearings and made investigations for the purpose of cutting down the expenses of the various departments, and in this investigation they had before them the heads of various departments, including Members of the Cabinet, and each and every one of them, from report made to me by members of that committee, stated that no reduction in expenses could be had in their departments.

How can we Members of Congress get this information, when there are thousands of offices and hundreds of thousands of employees in this Government, unless it comes to us through these departments, of which the administration is in control? Regardless of that fact, however, I am glad to say that the Committee on Appropriations have made many reductions, approved by the House, which will reduce the expenses of these departments. In the language of the Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, made on the floor of the House a few days ago: "I think it is a matter of supreme importance that the people of the country do know the truth about what this Congress is undertaking to do in the matter of economy, and I think the Congress of the United States ought to receive at the hands of the people the credit to which it is entitled for the earnest and diligent efforts as representatives of the American people in this body."

I have just spoken about lobbyists. But the greatest form of lobbying adopted in this country at the present time is that practiced by many organizations in writing form letters and sending them to your constituents and having them forward to you, oftentimes copied on their own local stationery. These letters come in by the thousands, and there was never a time in recent history when Members of Congress have been so flooded.

Mr. FRENCH, of Idaho, a few days ago stated on the floor of the House that he had been told that the cost of telegrams alone received by Members of Congress for days at a time would aggregate $10,000 a day. Quoting him further:

"The Members of this Congress must not permit the selfish demands of individuals and groups who are asking for larger and still larger appropriations to blind them to the importance of scaling down the budgets that we are called upon to meet."

With this sentiment I fully agree. We must not only economize, and thereby aid in balancing the Budget at less expense to the taxpayers, but something must be done to relieve the situation that now exists in this country. The expenses of the Federal Government are too great and must be reduced, but the greatest burden of direct taxation upon the greatest number of people in this country is that of State, county, and municipalities. What must be done toward solving the economic conditions of this country? Money has become too high; it must be made cheaper; and it appears to me that the only way this can be done is by a sane and safe expansion of the currency. If we ever have prosperity in this country, it must commence at the bottom with the producing class.

The farmer is in a pitiful condition, unable to sell that which he grows, except for a pittance. If he owed $1,000 three years ago, to pay that now in commodities which he raises would cost him some three or four thousand dollars. This can not continue indefinitely. There must be some way to stabilize the dollar and stabilize it according to the price of commodities of about 1926. Senator BORAH stated Monday on the floor of the Senate: "The gold dollar is no longer an honest dollar; no longer a dollar to be trusted." The idea is that it fluctuates in value. We have tried to reach this condition in the House by the passage of the Goldsborough bill, which means that the Federal Reserve Board shall buy up Government obligations and issue currency thereon until commodity prices reach a level of about 1926. This bill is indorsed by many of the most noted economists in this country. We must relieve this condition in some way. We must take care of our own people. There was never a time of recent years when conditions were so dreadful and the need was so great as at this present time. In my official career I have never felt the burdens and responsibilities so much, and everything that I can do toward economy in Government, toward that character of legislation that is sane and sound for general relief to the people of the United States, will be done.

I get numerous letters and telegrams daily from various places throughout the United States demanding economy in government, yet opposing any reduction in that proposition in which they are more vitally interested. So far as I am concerned I will close my eyes to these petty and personal requests and shall seek to do those things which I think is to the best interest of all the people of these United States and let the consequences be whatever they may. We have almost been led to the precipice by extravagance, and it is our duty to stay the hand and show the same character of patriotism that we would manifest during war, because this is a war against unemployment, against permitting the millions of men and women in this country to be out of employment, in destitute circumstances and children crying for bread.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement that I filed with the Committee on Rules with reference to H. R. 11677, including a statement and certain letters pertaining thereto and an exhibit referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, that is going a long way. The gentleman will have to modify his request. I object.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, in the name of economy the very heart of our national defense is being attacked by the bill reported out by the committee of which Mr. COLLINS, of Mississippi, is chairman. They propose to:

(a) Discontinue the citizens' military training camps.

(b) Discontinue the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps and to badly cripple our whole Reserve Officers' Training Corps system. Should this bill be passed as it is, such Reserve Officers' Training Corps units as those at the St. Joseph high schools would be discontinued.

(c) Discontinue the 14 days' pay for reserve officers' camps.

In 1920 we adopted our present national defense act. It provided that instead of maintaining a large standing army, we would maintain a large citizens' reserve which would serve to train our people not only in the fundamentals of defense but also in the principles of good citizenship. As a result we have for 12 years developed our National Guard and our Reserve Officers' Corps.

We all remember how unprepared we were in 1917. Thousands and thousands of lives were lost because we were unprepared. Also much valuable time was lost while we trained our men. Fortunately we had allies to hold the line until we could get partially ready. God forbid that we should have another war, but if we should we might not be so fortunate as to have such allies. Therefore, for the sake of the safety of the country as well as the men themselves, let us not abandon our national defense system at this time.

Now, I want to point out that the main benefits from the reserve and the citizens' military camps are not purely for national defense. Good citizenship is probably the most important objective and at no time was it so badly needed. I urge my colleagues to defeat the committee and to restore these important items of our national defense.

DEDICATION OF NEW STATE CAPITOL BUILDING, BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague [Mr. OVERTON] at the dedication of the new State Capitol in the city of Baton Rouge, La.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by my colleague Mr. OVERTON in the city of Baton Rouge, State of Louisiana, on May 16, 1932:

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN H. OVERTON, OF LOUISIANA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW $5,000,000 STATE CAPITOL

Your Excellency Governor Allen, Mr. Chairman, and fellow citizens, it is indeed, my friends, a pleasure to me, after four months' sojourn in the Capital of the Nation, to find myself once more in the capital of Louisiana. It is a pleasure to stand again upon the soil of my native State and mingle with her splendid and wonderful people. And it is a privilege of which I am justly proud to be permitted to take part in the celebration of a day and an event that promises to be so memorable in the history of our State.

As I stand before this vast throng, composed of citizens assembled here from every section of Louisiana, I am wondering whether they will consider that I am guilty of any impropriety in singling out the people of this splendid city of Baton Rouge and congratulating them upon the fact that the often-agitated question of the removal of our State capital appears about to be definitely settled for all time to come. They deserve our congratulations. There has probably not been in the history of any State in the Union—and, as far as I know, in the history of any nation—a capital that has been so migratory as the capital of Louisiana. Our capital first came into existence in the city of New Orleans, where she remained until 1829. She then journeyed up the Mississippi River and established her residence in the delightful town of Donaldsonville. But in 1831 she concluded to return to the place of her nativity and she reestablished herself in the Crescent City. There she remained until 1846, when, again seized with wanderlust, she once more journeyed up the Mississippi and established her place of abode on the high banks and beautiful site of the city of Baton Rouge.

The dangers of the War between the States caused her to seek a temporary refuge in the town of Opelousas and then in the city of Shreveport. In 1864 she again returned to the metropolis of the South, but in 1882 she concluded to return to the object of her maturer affections. Here she has remained until the present day, but during the 50 years that have intervened since 1882, the date of her last removal, the claim of Baton Rouge to the permament location of the seat of our Government has been a matter of more or less constant dispute and agitation.

Seven times, therefore, has Louisiana's capital been changed. Legislative statutes and constitutional ordinances have been enacted in vain to compel her to a fixed abode and assign her to a permanent domicile. That vexatious question, however, that has perturbed the State of Louisiana since its admission to the Union has been at last set at rest. It has been settled, Mr. Chairman, not by legislative enactment or constitutional mandate but by the occurrence of two things during the administration that has just been brought to a close. The first was the building in the city of Baton Rouge of a place of residence for our governors becoming the dignity of that high office. The second, and the final and the conclusive event, has been the erection upon this historic site of a permanent, magnificent capitol building, capable of responding to the present needs and the future growth of Louisiana and symbolizing in its architectural beauty, its ample proportions, its massive grandeur, and its towering height of marble, steel, and stone the sovereign majesty of Louisiana's proud Commonwealth.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that we stand upon a historic site. It is not only historical in the sense that it is prophetic of the continued greatness of Louisiana, but it is historical because it teems with memories of the years gone by. On these very grounds, and within a stone's throw of where we are assembled, stood the famous red pole which once marked the boundary lines between the hunting grounds of the Houma and Bayou Goula Indians, and from which Baton Rouge derives its name. Up and down the mighty river that sweeps by us traveled the early explorers of a newly discovered continent. Here the white man pitted himself against the red man, and Spaniards, French, and English contended against each other in their early struggles for the conquest and dominion of a new world. It was upon these grounds that in 1822 the United States Government established a military post by the erection of garrison and arsenal buildings, most of which still stand round about us. Since 1886 up until a short time ago these grounds and buildings have been devoted to the education of Louisiana's youth in that great institution of public education, the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College. Over this site have floated the flags of six different dominions, the flags of France, of Spain, of England, of the Republic of West Florida, the flag of the Confederacy, and, finally, and let us hope forever, the glorious banner of our Nation, the Stars and Stripes of America.

It is, indeed, my fellow citizens, a far cry from the red pole of the Indian tribes to this stately and towering capitol—

> "Whose sky-line dome
> Hath typified by work of daring art
> The true design and aim"— of Louisiana and her great people.

It is worthy of observation and comment on this occasion that the few facts of the history of this particular site to which I have referred are, after all, an epitome and panorama of the history and development and evolution of our Nation. The hunting grounds of the Indian; the exploits of the early explorers; the various flags of different nations struggling for the mastery of a new world; the garrisoned post of war; the college and university of public education and enlightenment; and, finally, this massive, modern structure, embodying the conception of a free and independent State, a State that is an integral part of a National Government which, in spite of the gloom and despair and tragedies of the present hour, is still the greatest temporal government ever ordained by "the brain and purpose of man."

In the dedication, Mr. Chairman, of this capitol to its permament location in this beautiful city, and upon these historic grounds, I wish to take the liberty of congratulating first of all our former governor and present United States Senator, the Hon. HUEY P. LONG. His was the vision to conceive, the courage to propose, and the hand to direct and consummate this great and patriotic enterprise.

I congratulate His Excellency the Hon. O. K. Allen, who has just been honored with the official bestowal of the highest office within the gift of the people of this State, and who has realized an ambition of which any Louisianian may well be proud. And permit me to say, my fellow citizens, that it is indeed a fortunate circumstance that in this trying period we shall have presiding over our new capitol and directing the reigns of our government one possessed of the capacity, the public experience, the indefatigable energy, and the sound common sense of Gov. O. K. Allen.

I extend my congratulations to our lieutenant governor, Hon. John B. Fuornet, to the heads of the various departments of our State, to our senators and representatives, and to the entire official family of the incoming administration upon the fact that they are the first to utilize this capitol wherein largely the future history of Louisiana will be written. I congratulate them that they shall enjoy its advantages and its inspiration in their efforts to complete the great constructive work of the outgoing administration, and in doing their part toward solving the grave problems that now seem to baffle and confuse the legislative councils of almost the entire world.

Above all, I congratulate the people of our State. This is our capitol, authorized by us and owned by us. A capitol is peculiar to and expressive of free and independent states. Monarchies have no capitols. They have the palaces of kings. This great structure is our building, the concrete expression of our pride in our State. There could be, Mr. Chairman, no more convincing and eloquent evidence of the unconquerable spirit and splendid patriotism of the people of Louisiana than the fact that in the midst of the world's greatest depression, they should be here on this day dedicating, not only to their own use but to the use and enjoyment of generations yet to come, a statehouse that would do honor to any State in the Union.

It is indeed a remarkable circumstance, a remarkable tribute to the spirit of the people of this State, that in the midst of this depression Louisiana has not only builded this capitol but has continued a constructive program of public improvement that finds no parallel in any other State of the Union of similar wealth and advantages. And I would be guilty, Mr. Chairman, of misgivings that I do not entertain, I would be guilty of doubting without just cause the capacity and resourcefulness of our newly inaugurated governor, I would be guilty of questioning unfairly the unconquerable spirit of Louisiana, if I did not here prophesy that this great work undertaken by the last administration will yet be completed and brought to a glorious fulfillment under the leadership of the present administration.

I can not, my friends, find it in my heart to sound any note of despair in this festal hour of general rejoicing. Why, anyway, should we of Louisiana surrender to the forces of gloom and despair? We have been through hard times before. We have lived through depressions in the past. We have suffered panics in the years gone by. We have survived them all. We have not only survived them, but we have each time arisen from their conquest stronger in our faith and in our confidence and proceeded to move onward in the pathway of human progress. We have never shown the white feather, and we are not going to show it now. We have in the past met and solved all our problems, and we shall continue to meet and solve them with that determined and victorious spirit with which our pioneer fathers carved a great civilization out of this wilderness and upheld and maintained that civilization and carried it forward to an even more glorious future through all the trials and tribulations of the days of reconstruction.

Why, I repeat, should we surrender to the forces of despair? While it is true that in common with the rest of the Nation we have thousands of our citizens out of employment and our crop prices and commodity prices are at the lowest of levels, yet we still have, undestroyed and unimpaired, our fertile soils, our natural resources, our farms, our cities, our towns, and our structures and institutions of public welfare. No plague or pestilence, no war within the last few years, has destroyed or depleted the agricultural, industrial, laboring, or economic forces of this State or Nation. We have as much natural and tangible wealth as we had in the 1929 peak year of prosperity.

It must, therefore, be apparent to anyone that our present financial difficulty is not to be attributed to a loss or depletion of wealth or of our resources or of our man power. We have all these in the same abundance that we had in the very height and zenith of our prosperity. The main trouble, my friends, lies in both the hoarding and the unequal distribution of the wealth of this country.

Is there any man, rich or poor, billionaire or pauper, who will defend the proposition that it is either sound or just for 1 per cent of the people of this country to own and control 59 per cent of its wealth? We are still the richest, as we are the most powerful and the greatest Nation on the face of the globe and in all the history of the world. We still have an estimated national wealth of $400,000,000,000. But, in all frankness, let me ask the question whether it is sound economically, whether it is conducive to the general welfare, whether it is helpful to the happiness and liberty and progress of our people, that 1 per cent of our population of 120,000,000 souls should own and control over two hundred billions of our national wealth and the rest of it be parceled out among the remaining 99 per cent? There is nothing socialistic or radical in such an attitude toward public affairs. I am conservative by nature. I simply put the plain and unvarnished statement of the present concentration and reconcentration of wealth in the hands of the few, and I challenge even the beneficiaries of such an economic condition successfully to defend it.

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

I take no stand, my fellow citizens, against wealth as such or or against its honest accumulation. I do not advocate its confiscation; but I do adhere to the sound and just doctrine that the taxes and the expenses of government should fall on those best able to bear them, and I do urge that, especially in this hour of national calamity, wealth should be made to bear an increasing proportion of our public burdens.

The President of the United States, its Secretary of the Treasury, our greatest political leaders, our financial experts, and economists tell us that we are face to face with one of the greatest crises in the history of our country. They tell us that we are at war—at war against depression, at war against financial collapse, at war against the threatened bankruptcy of our Governments, National and State. How, then, are we to fight against the forces of economic collapse and financial bankruptcy? What are the means, the munitions, the instrumentalities of this kind of warfare? When we are engaged in physical warfare, when the enemy fires upon the American flag, what do we do? We summon—we have always summoned—the masses and manhood of this country to rally to its battle standards, and they have always responded to our call to arms.

In the late World War we not only summoned but we drafted and conscripted them. We took the clerk from behind his counter, the laborer from out of his factory, the farmer's boy from behind his plow. We placed them in training camps; we sent them 3,000 miles across the ocean; we offered them as living sacrifices to the murderous fire of the enemy's guns in order that our Nation might be saved from the great danger that threatened it and this world made safe for true democracy. And they—the farmer's boy, the clerk, the laborer, the fighting manhood of our Nation—brought Old Glory back from across the seas unsullied and undefeated. And in every physical warfare in which we have been engaged—from the Revolutionary War to the World War, from Lexington and Concord to Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry—the great masses of our American citizenship, its men and women, have so rallied to the flag that it never yet has been lowered in defeat.

But, my friends, we are engaged to-day in no physical conflict. The war in which we are engaged is a financial and economic one, and in such a conflict we can look only to the wealth of our country to supply the resources, the forces, the munitions, and the weapons of battle. And in this hour of national financial peril, in this hour of threatened governmental bankruptcy, it is proper that the wealth of our country should be compelled to its defense by adequate taxation upon its incomes and its inheritances for the purpose of national salvation.

Let us therefore, Mr. Chairman and my fellow citizens of Louisiana, dedicate this capitol and rededicate ourselves to the simple and imperishable truths upon which our Republic was founded in a period of greater storm and stress than now confronts us. It is the observance of, and adherence to, these fundamental maxims of public policy that will preserve our Nation and its glorious sisterhood of States from the perils that threaten their destruction. Let us dedicate this capitol to "the self-evident truths that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." And let us dedicate this capitol to the sublime truth that from the beginning it was ordained to be, and through the patriotic purpose of a mighty people and under the blessings of a Divine Providence it will continue to be, "a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

LAWLESSNESS

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress can not afford to adjourn without passing legislation which will remedy the two cardinal evils that notoriously exist and are threatening the life of this country. One is the unemployment situation, and the other is the crime wave. The two problems are, in my judgment, of equal gravity. In fact, I believe that they are interrelated.

However, I am addressing myself at this time particularly to the intolerable condition of lawlessness which is rampant throughout the country and has virtually broken down all law and order. If we are candid with ourselves, we have to confess that the ordinary law-enforcing machinery of the Nation has broken completely down.

The very first function of Government is to protect the life of its citizens. At this hour any man's life is in danger; the same is true of his property. I am sure I am within the record when I say that murders in this country have increased one hundred fold within the last decade, and that kidnaping has increased at a much larger ratio. The traditional judicial and police law enforcement instrumentalities, as they are provided by the several States, are not only inadequate but wholly incompetent to cope with the exigency.

I have given this question serious study for many years. I have observed this growing menace to our society very closely. But it really requires no specialization to appreciate the seriousness of this national disaster. Dire apprehension is in the mind of every good citizen as to where it will finally end.

The Wickersham Commission commented upon the gravity and magnitude of crime and general lawlessness, and I understand they are about to further report astounding revelations in this connection in the near future.

The States, as I have indicated, are impotent to suppress the crime movement at its present stage. It has been my observation that in the commission of the major crimes, such as murder, kidnaping, bombing, rape, and such criminal activities as are perpetrated in the furtherance of what is known as "racketeering," only one out of a hundred is ever successfully prosecuted.

I further make the assertion that there are many thousands of such crimes enacted which never become publicly known. Frequently, we hear of persons mysteriously disappearing. Hundreds of our women are being raped, who, either out of modesty or fear of naming the guilty parties, forego reporting their experiences.

In a large percentage of cases in which prosecutions are attempted, witnesses will either not appear at all or testify in exoneration of the accused under the duress which is actually or presumably held over them by the gang of which the defendant happens to be affiliated.

As I have said before in an address in the House of Representatives, crime is not sporadic and emanating from individuals here and there. Crime is organized. Crime is entrenched in fortified camps. Killers and homicidal maniacs constitute a veritable hostile army in our midsts. Brains and master minds are the captains in this army, while the morons and perverts, dope fiends, and other human débris, either serve under these captains or fraternize with their cause.

These captains command millions of dollars which we know they employ, first, to corrupt officials and, secondly, to defend themselves against prosecutions.

The time is here to-day and at this very hour that the Federal Government must assume the burden of eradicating criminal lawlessness. I am fully aware of the doctrine that the police power resides only in the States, and in ordinary times that is where it ought to be.

But these are extraordinary times. This is war, war between human rights and the forces of good government on the one side, and the boast of corruption, lawlessness, bribery, murder, arson, rapine, abduction, robbery on the other.

This Government can not endure if its citizens are constantly in a potential danger of being assassinated and abducted, its women in danger of being ravished, and its babies kidnaped and brutally murdered.

In order to make it definite and certain that the Federal Government has clear and incontestable jurisdiction to surveil the activities of these modern brigands, bandits, and freebooters in their arrogant and ruthless spoliation of the lives and the property of the citizens, I am proposing by the joint resolution that I have introduced in the House to-day to amend the Constitution of the United States—conferring upon Congress plenary and unlimited authority to create a code of laws and to set up a crime-surveilling machinery that will be effective and adequate in the premises.

This joint resolution, which will probably be known as the twenty-first amendment to the Constitution of the United States, could, and, in my judgment, would, pass both Houses of Congress before the end of the present session, and inasmuch as the necessary number of States will hold legislative sessions in January, 1933, it is very probable, under the state of the public mind as it now exists, that the amendment would be ratified by these States, thereby enabling Congress to exercise its new powers within less than one year from this day.

I regret that the President of the United States and the Attorney General have not heretofore moved in the premises. I can not conceive how they can sit supinely by and permit this national menace to continue.

If the Attorney General has been correctly quoted, he went out of his way to advise the Judiciary Committee of the House that the Government is not disposed to take on any additional obligations in that behalf or to enter into new fields of criminal jurisdiction, and that he specifically opposed the various bills before the Judiciary Committee of the House, including the Cochran bill, which undertakes to penalize kidnaping transactions involving interstate transportation of the victims.

But in contradiction to their attitude and by sheer usurpation of power these exalted officials have tendered the entire law-enforcing agency of the Federal Government to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh in his quest to seek and apprehend the guilty parties who abducted and murdered his little baby. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing that action; on the contrary, it is what they ought to do and what they should have done immediately.

The Lindbergh case illustrates forcibly the utter inefficacy of the State police methods and systems. As the Wickersham Commission has well said, the law officers of the States are woefully incompetent. Sheriffs and policemen are not chosen for their technique but invariably for political reasons. Police duty in this day and age requires experts—men of a very high order of intelligence, courage, and integrity. These modern crimes can only be solved by scientific men and scientific methods. The days of the Hawkshaws and constables are over.

Bone-headed police, from Norman Schwartzkopf down, have bungled the Lindbergh case and have even hampered, if not frustrated, the potential possibilities of apprehending the guilty parties. If the agencies of the Federal Government had taken full charge of this case in its early stages, assuming that it would have had on its staff expert criminologists and investigators, I believe that the baby's life would have been spared, and the guilty perpetrators of this dastardly crime, which has shocked the world, would have been apprehended and summarily and successfully prosecuted. Certainly the Curtis-Peacock hoax, unequaled in its mendacity, would not have been permitted to be perpetrated upon the credulous and broken-hearted Lindbergh and to further aggravate his wounded sensibilities.

But would Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mitchell do for other fathers and mothers of less distinction than the Lindberghs what they did for them? Since the Lindbergh kidnaping there have been a score or more of kidnapings of children and adults equally precious and dear to their kin, but not a word or the turn of a hand by Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mitchell.

I warn that the kidnaping epidemic has only started. In the future victims in the common walks of life—yes; hundreds of them—will be marked for exploitation. I recall reading recently of several instances in which children of parents of moderate means were kidnaped and held for ransom in sums ranging from $300 to $5,000. From whom can this class of victims expect protection and assistance?

I propose by my measure to do for all of the mothers and fathers and for all of the babies in this country who may hereafter become victimized by kidnapers what Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mitchell have so freely and generously undertaken to do for Mr. and Mrs. Lindbergh.

We are told that the liquor traffic before prohibition caused the deaths, within the United States, of approximately 2,000 persons annually. Crime in recent years has claimed many thousands of lives annually. If there was justification for the eighteenth amendment, which I deny, there is more justification for a constitutional amendment to extirpate crime which not only slays thousands of human beings and deprives citizens of their property but, unless arrested, will convert this country of boasted law and order into anarchy and chaos.

The Cochran bill should be immediately passed by Congress. It is as drastic and far-reaching as possible under our present constitutional limitations. However, I can conceive of kidnaping transactions that could not be reached by the terms of that measure. The kidnapers could evade the provisions of any Federal law now capable of being enacted by so scheming as to avoid the use of the mail and interstate movements. Furthermore, the inadequacy of such legislation is obvious because Federal agencies could not intervene until postcrime facts develop which indicate the use of the mail or the interstate transportation of the victim.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by publishing in the RECORD a statement I made before the Committee on Ways and Means recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following argument made by myself before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, April 15, 1932:

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I promised several Members time this morning, and I just have to do the very best I can under the circumstances. I will have to go out of order again. Mr. Jed Johnson is on the Military Affairs Committee and they are going to consider a very important matter this morning. They are in session at this time. He has introduced H. R. 10096 asking for the full payment of the adjusted-service certificates. He only wants a few minutes of your time.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. We shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, because of my desire to speed up the hearings, and also because several of my distinguished colleagues desire to appear before your distinguished committee, I shall not take as much time as I had contemplated using.

I have attended practically all of the hearings and have also listened on the floor of the House to arguments made against this bill since these hearings began. I have also read a great many editorials in newspapers arguing against the passage of this bonus legislation, and I find that the great burden of the argument against the payment of the veterans' adjusted certificates in full seems to be, first, that this is not a debt due the veterans but a gift, and outright dole, or donation that Congress is called upon to make. Some say that if it is a debt that the debt is not now due. We are constantly reminded that the adjusted-service certificates will not become due under the law until 1945.

I do not share the views of the opposition who say that this is not a debt; neither do I admit for a moment that it is not due.

I listened with surprise to one of the witnesses for the bonus the other day who said, "We admit that it is not due." I make no such admission. I do not hesitate to say to this committee that it is all past due, and it is a rank insult to every man who wore the uniform to refer to this legislation as a proposed donation to the World War veterans.

All of you will doubtless remember that hardly had the bark of the cannon died away and the smoke cleared up from the battlefields in the Argonne Forest when the railroads, the shipbuilders, and some of the ammunition factories, as well as several thousand civilian employees, came to Congress demanding a bonus for their "patriotic war-time services." They did not ask for promissory notes. The railroads did not ask for notes due in 1945. The shipbuilders did not ask for promises, but they wanted the cash on the barrel head. I am ashamed to say that Congress very soon after the war gave the shipbuilders their bonus, and gave it to them in cold cash. They gave the civilian employees, the shipbuilders, the railroads, and the ammunition makers, some of whom had profiteered to the tune of 500 per cent, their bonus in cash. Then, after the railroads had gotten their bonus, some one thought that probably the boys who had faced the machine guns at a dollar and a quarter a day should have their pay adjusted—not a bonus, mind you; Congress never gave the veterans a bonus, but merely proposed to adjust their pay.

Then others have said that the veterans are now breaking faith with Congress; that they had agreed to take these promissory notes, this sort of long-time insurance, and therefore that the veterans had broken faith with Congress. I want to remind the members of this committee that no outstanding veteran or veterans' organization, like the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, or disabled veteran organizations, ever asked for this thing they got. But they had to accept the 20-year adjusted-service certificates or nothing.

In the fall of 1919 the first American Legion convention was held in Minneapolis. At that convention a resolution was adopted calling attention of the Congress in a general way to the fact that "our Government has an obligation to all service men and women to relieve the financial disadvantages incident to their military service, an obligation second only to that of caring for the disabled and the widows and orphans of those who sacrificed their lives, and one already acknowledged by our allies."

In February, 1920, Congress having failed to give any relief in the matter of adjusting the pay of our former service men, the American Legion executive committee met in Indianapolis and passed a resolution again calling the attention of the Congress that in the opinion of the Legion all service men and women were entitled to adjusted compensation "in the form and for the amount of a $50 bond for each month's service rendered during the period of this war."

Congress failed and refused to pass the legislation requested by any service men's organization or any outstanding veteran, but Members of this body contented themselves, up until 1924, by delivering many speeches in both Houses, eulogizing the boys for their heroism rather than giving them substantial relief. Toward the latter part of 1920 the American Legion presented what was termed its fourfold plan and the same was introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee where this committee added what it called a 20-year paid-up insurance to the veteran. I call your attention to the fact that the fifth plan of insurance instead of cash was not the brainchild of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the disabled veterans, or any other former service men's organization, but it had its inception in this powerful committee as a sort of sop to the soldiers and yet permitted the Government to escape and evade the payment of the adjusted pay in cash, as the veterans and veterans' organizations were at that time demanding.

The plan to adjust the pay of the veterans, in cash, was bitterly opposed and defeated by the international bankers, bond brokers, and Wall Street in general. In fact, many of the same gentlemen who will appear before this committee in the next few days in opposition to legislation to pay the bonus in full now, stated the same, or similar, reasons for opposing any kind of a bonus bill ten or a dozen years ago. It is not worth while for me to go further into the history of this legislation. Some of the distinguished members of this committee recall how a multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury appeared before this committee time and again between the years 1920 and 1924 in opposition to any kind of a soldier bonus bill and especially in opposition to the bill veterans were sponsoring to adjust their pay in cash. When the bill was finally passed to hand the veterans a promissory note instead of adjusting their pay Wall Street and the other international bankers and bond brokers with foreign securities openly boasted that they had won a great victory.

I said a while ago that the railroads, munition makers, shipbuilders, civilian employees, and others received their adjusted pay in the year 1919, immediately after the ending of the war. They not only received their pay but they also received the interest rate they demanded from the beginning of the war. I submit in all fairness that if those with less-hazardous jobs were entitled to pay from the beginning of the war, with interest, the war veterans, who faced machine guns and the shrapnel that American profiteers sold to this Government at 500 per cent profit, are entitled to interest from the date of their enlistment. If that be true and the war veteran had been paid his interest at the same rate the railroads received at the hands of this Government, the adjusted-service certificates would have fallen due in the year 1931. I have no apologies in looking members of this committee in the face and say it is a just debt; it is an acknowledged obligation by the Government; it is long past due, and this Congress can not longer sidestep nor evade the issue.

So, I repeat, that if the veterans had received their interest at the same rate that the railroads, the shipbuilders, and the civilian employees and others who profited off war received theirs, every penny of it would be due now.

Mr. RAINEY. May I interrupt?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. You may ask me a question.

Mr. RAINEY. What do you mean by bonus to the railroads?

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean that they asked and received their bonus in cold cash with added interests from the very moment they were taken over.

Mr. RAINEY. Was that not a payment for the Government operation of the railroads during the war?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes; Congress called it a payment. I say that in fact it was a gift—in cold cash. Congress proved itself to be a big Santa Claus to the railroads.

Mr. RAINEY. That was a reimbursement to the stockholders of the railroads.

Mr. JOHNSON. Reimbursement is the term Congress applied, but may I remind the distinguished gentlemen that considering the watered stock, it proved to be a donation or a dole rather than a bona fide reimbursement.

Mr. VINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will yield, although I must not consume too much time.

Mr. VINSON. I just want to make the observation that in turning the railroads back to private ownership they certainly got section 15 (a) of the interstate commerce act, which carried the recapture clause.

Mr. JOHNSON. Absolutely. The railroads ought to believe in Santa Claus.

Mr. VINSON. And if I read the signs of the times, there is going to be several hundred million dollars turned back to them by virtue of legislation which will probably be enacted at this Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; by legislation already enacted. Congress was induced to pass the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation act in order, we were told, to end the depression, and Congress dished out another dole to the railroads. Now all of us realize that it was a farce and a fake. We now have the sorry spectacle of seeing defunct railroads "borrowing" millions of dollars from the Government with their bonds worth 12 cents on the dollar.

Mr. VINSON. As I understand it, the amount involved under this recapture clause is something like $500,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that is about right. I am sure the distinguished gentleman knows.

Mr. HILL. That is money that the railroads have earned.

Mr. VINSON. Yes; but earned under the mandate of section 15 (a), which provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission should fix the rates at such a figure that they would earn the 5½ per cent plus the 1 per cent for rehabilitation, and one-half of the 1 per cent for rehabilitation was under the recapture clause to go in the Treasury of the United States, and very few dollars have yet found their way into the Treasury of the United States, and the $500,000,000 or more will be turned back to the railroads.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman's statement is unquestionably true, and in that connection, since the question of the railroads earning their bonus has been raised, I want to say, not as a general who pulled down a big salary during the war, but as a very humble private in the rear ranks but with front-line service, that I know war veterans more than earned every dollar Congress has admitted it owes them.

The opposition to this legislation has greatly stressed the fact that the American Legion organization in its last national convention failed to pass a resolution indorsing the bonus. Also, that Commander Stevens, of that great organization, has recently gone on record as violently opposed to it.

I do not care to go into that discussion further than to say that neither the action of the national convention nor that of the wealthy young commander who doesn't need his bonus certificate represents the sentiment of the rank and file of the legionnaires of Oklahoma. For the national commander to say that only 23 posts of the country had indorsed the bonus at the time of his statement was absurd on the face of it. Practically every American Legion post in the State of Oklahoma indorsed full payment months ago. What applies to Oklahoma applies in a general way to a majority of the States of the Union. I am told that national committeemen of that great organization will soon meet at Indianapolis and at that time will give Commander Stevens some inside information and probably a just reprimand for his unwarranted action in opposing this just legislation.

When the array of big business men, great financiers, near financiers, economists, and would-be economists appear before this committee next week in opposition to this legislation, I assume that the burden of their arguments will be that this bill, if and when passed, will destroy the financial structure of the Government. No doubt the committee will be warned against the passage of this legislation and will be repeatedly told that the 50 per cent loans made to the veterans by the last Congress did not revive business.

Let me say in reply to the charge that the 50 per cent loans did not stimulate business. I personally know that in many sections the veterans' loan not only revived but was a tremendous stimulation to business in general in spite of the fact that not one dollar of actual money was issued. What the veterans received was credit, not money. Not one new dollar was placed in circulation, and that, gentlemen, was not a gift. What Congress actually did was to lend the veteran 50 per cent of his own money. It must also be remembered that a great majority of the veterans who have borrowed at all on their certificates had previously borrowed 20 to 25 per cent before the passage of the 50 per cent act. So the loans in fact only amounted to 25 to 30 per cent instead of 50 per cent, as one unfamiliar with this legislation might think. The inference has also gone out that the veterans' loans have caused the deficit in the Treasury; that the money came from the pockets of the taxpayers of the country.

Even Members of Congress have made such erroneous statements. The fact is that aside from a small amount appropriated by Congress to administer the fund, this money, or practically all of it, came from the veterans themselves; from premiums paid by the veterans on their insurance during their war-time service. That fund, made up of premiums on this insurance, amounted to $881,000,000, and yet Congressmen and others boast that they gave the veterans the money. What Congress did was to lend 50 per cent on these certificates, and then had the nerve to charge the veteran 4½ per cent compound interest on his own money. At the same time this Government can go out in the market and get money for less than 2 per cent. The veterans know they did not get a square deal on that loan, and it is a sad fact unless the 4½ per cent compound interest is canceled many veterans will actually owe the Government on the last half of the bonus in 1945.

Answering the charge that payment of the bonus in full will hurt business, I will say to this committee that I do not pose as an economist or a financier. If the great Champ Clark, after studying the money question for a lifetime, would admit that he knew nothing about the money question and doubted seriously if anybody else did, I would not have the temerity to tell this committee that I pose as an authority on the subject. If I thought that the payment of the last half of the bonus would impair the financial structure of the Government or hurt business to any extent whatsoever, I would not, under any circumstances, support this legislation. On the other hand, after talking to many economists and financiers in high authority, I am fully convinced that the currency must be expanded or reexpanded, as Senator Owen and other authorities on the subject have said, and it occurs to me that either the Patman bill or the Thomas-Johnson bill (H. R. 10096), introduced by me and now pending before this committee, would be a practical way of expanding the currency. In my judgment it is imperative that some action be taken by Congress and that immediately, to give the country cheaper money.

I think it is generally admitted that money has become entirely too high and commodities too unreasonably low, and something must be done and done quickly to bring up the price of commodities and cheapen the dollar. The fact that members of the Federal Reserve Board all over the United States, after these hearings started, were called to Washington to discuss ways and means to expand the currency is evidence that there is merit to this legislation.

Of course, all of us understand that this hurried action on the part of the Federal Reserve Board at this time is primarily for the purpose of defeating this legislation, but even if that be true the veterans have won a moral victory and yet the average American citizen will ask himself if the Federal Reserve Board can, without any authority of law, go into the open markets and buy a billion dollars' worth of securities why did it not do so six months ago—why did it not do so a year ago—or two years ago—and save the country from the most terrible money panic America has had in the past quarter of a century? The announcement of the Federal Reserve Board that it will increase the currency within the next few weeks is a terrible condemnation of its policies in its failure and refusal to do so in the past.

Mr. MCCORMACK. In other words, you do not think that the recent action of the Federal Reserve Board completely supports the theory of the opponents of this legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite true. On the other hand it demonstrates that the Federal Reserve Board admits the soundness of the plans here being considered. It is not a question of what Congress would like to do, but I am fully convinced that the expansion or reexpansion of the currency must be done, and that it must be done quickly.

Mr. RAGON. If I understood Senator THOMAS when he was here the other day, he felt that the terms of the Patman bill might greatly injure the Federal reserve system.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I heard the statement of our distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. I do not share his view altogether. There is no question but that some of the money under the Patman bill would come in competition with the Federal reserve, but it would not be any appreciable amount, and not enough to kill the Federal reserve or seriously cripple it. But frankly, I measure my words when I say the Federal Reserve Board ought to function as originally intended in the interest of the people, or else Congress ought to abolish it.

I desire to make it plain, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, that I am not wedded to any plan. I have no pride of authorship of the bill I have introduced in Congress in keeping with the ideas suggested by Senator THOMAS and also similar to the suggestion of Senator Owen. The Thomas-Johnson bill would go through the Federal reserve and make that a functioning organization operating in the interest of the people instead of by and for Wall Street and the international bankers.

It is needless for me to picture to you the conditions and the need for relief for our war veterans and their families. You have heard that over and over again; but let me say in closing that if $2,000,000,000 of additional currency were sent out into every nook and corner of America, in my judgment it would revive business immediately. It is a practical way of increasing or expanding the currency. It would have the effect of raising commodity prices. It would save the homes of thousands of war veterans where foreclosures have already been started. It would melt the long bread lines, stop suicides, and relieve suffering in every town and hamlet. It would not only fill empty box cars but fill millons of empty stomachs, and replace misery and suffering with a ray of sunshine and hope, and at the same time pay a just and acknowledged debt due the war veterans by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CRISP. We thank you very much for your presence.

CRITICISMS OF CONGRESSMEN

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, more untrue, unfair, mean things are being said about Members of Congress than ever before. We are only human and make mistakes just like other folks. We should be criticized like other folks. The criticisms should be fair, honest, and based on a true statement of facts. There is not an honest Member of Congress who would not welcome criticisms, to the fullest extent, of his official record in Congress and yet in political campaigns and generally this is not done. Exactly the contrary too often takes place.

Speaking for myself—most other Members feel the same way—I beg and plead for honest criticisms of the thousands of votes I have cast; the hundreds of speeches and statements I have made; the scores of bills I have introduced and the hundreds and even thousands of official acts I have performed.

If anyone feels that by word or act I have ever been unfair to the farmer, the laboring man, the ex-soldier, or the common people, please let him say where, when, and how. I know some feel that I should be criticized. Many see things differently from me. To these I say, "Criticize my record, my votes, my bills, my speeches, my official conduct, and what I did or did not do. Please do not blame me for what others do over my protest. Please do not arrest me, try me, convict me, hang me, and blacken the name of myself and family forever for crimes of which I am absolutely innocent, which I condemn, and which I did my very best to prevent at the very risk of my political existence."

No fair man would condemn all the members of all the churches for the sins of only a few, neither would he condemn all humanity for the crimes of an individual.

An honest man would not visit punishment on the whole of a family for the errors of a brother or sister, and yet every day, in almost every newspaper and in every political statement we see or hear, we find an avalanche of awful criticisms and vile abuses heaped on all of Congress and every Member thereof, all because some one believes that either a majority of Congress or a minority of Congress or an individual Member has made a mistake or done wrong.

I beg the public to judge each tree by its own fruit and each vine by its own thorns. Sodom and Gomorrah were not destroyed because there were a few or even a majority of the inhabitants sinful, but because all violated and transgressed God's law. Everyone was judged by his own deeds, and the punishment was altogether just.

At this time I want to limit this discussion to some newspaper criticisms, and especially to a criticism of a bill introduced by me some time ago. I do not object to a criticism of my bill. I do object, though, to a distorted, unfair criticism; and it is of this I wish to speak presently. Before I do this let us endeavor to ascertain why more criticisms are being made of Congressmen than ever before. Is it because they are worse? I do not think so. Is it because we are putting forth less effort than previously? Surely this is not the case. There is a greater effort to render real service than was ever known before. What is the trouble, then? I know the cause, and I will put the blame where I feel it belongs; but before doing so I want to excuse many of the local or county papers for carrying this unfair propaganda. As a rule these small papers are edited by the very best men in our country. They would not purposely do any man, woman, or child an injustice. It happens oft-times, though, that being misled by the big dailies or other large periodicals they innocently reprint items that are unfair, misleading, and that do an injustice.

Thus it is that no one can estimate the injustice that may be done by one unfair article carried by a big paper, reproduced by smaller papers, and then carried by word of mouth throughout the length and breadth of the country.

No one knows the never-ending, powerful, deadly effect of such poison better than the big financial interests and their paid allies—the big subsidized newspapers of the Nation.

Just as the rattlesnake uses his poison to destroy those he does not like, so the great financial interests and great newspapers owned or controlled by them use the venom of misrepresentation in an effort to kill those who oppose them or do not humbly do their will.

These big papers mislead the public by failing and refusing to publish the truth concerning Members of Congress who are not subservient to the big interests and who refuse to do the will of the big papers and their owners. They perpetrate a fraud on the public and seek to destroy faithful Members of Congress by not publishing anything that is to the credit of the Member without twisting and distorting it and by leaving out the most important part so as to make the Member appear silly or criminal, or both, and his official act appear vicious and antagonistic to his people.

These papers also seize upon slight indiscretions of a few Members to bring reproach upon all the Congress. They take special care by separate special personal items to make those who truckle to them appear to be patriotic statesmen and worthy of the fullest confidence of all people. Small or trivial matters are unduly magnified, distorted, and twisted beyond all reason.

This is what is done as to the Members' stationery allowance, mileage, franking privilege, and clerical assistance.

Every presidential-campaign year the country is whipped into a frenzy of hatred of Members of Congress by grossly unfair representations as to these items. I wish there was some way for them all to be eliminated. I will vote to cut out entirely the stationery allowance and the mileage.

The stationery allowance was $125 a year, and this session I voted to make it $90 a year. I would much rather pay out of my salary the cost of my ink, pens, envelopes, letterheads, and other stationery than have the newspapers always abusing my friends and me about this item.

Let us discuss briefly the mileage item of 20 cents a mile each way to cover all traveling expenses for each year unless there is an extra session. The public has been led to believe that every time a Member rides on the train he either rides on a pass or at 3 cents a mile and charges 20 cents a mile up to the Government. This is not the case, and yet our people, by this false statement, are led to hate us and feel that we are very dishonest.

Some say the actual traveling expenses of Members should be paid instead of this straight allowance. This would cost the Government much more. Many Members go home every week, some every night, and practically every Member spends his entire mileage allowance each year traveling to and from his home or on board and other expenses staying in Washington on the job, while others are going to and from their homes.

If actual traveling expenses were paid, the man who stayed on this job the least and ran over the country the most would get the most money, and the man who stayed on the job the most would get the least.

The man who lives a long distance away and makes only one trip a year may save a little money, but even this is spent in paying expenses here, and for his family if he has one.

There is no traveling allowance for a Member's family.

Since criticism of this mileage item has been made in my district and was evidently intended for me, I trust I will be pardoned for a personal reference when I say that no one in Congress has a better record for staying on the job than I have. I have never been out of Washington a single day while the House was in session since I was elected. I have never gone to Georgia or elsewhere while the House was in session except to the funeral of a Georgia Member of the House or a Georgia Senator, and I stay here doing urgent departmental work most of the time the House is not in session. And yet, in spite of the small amount of traveling I do, I have not been able to save any money out of my travel allowance.

I voted to cut it to 15 cents a mile each year, and I will vote to cut it out altogether. If the Senate passes the bill we passed in the House, my mileage for the present whole calendar year would be about $250. I would rather not get this than to be called a leech, a thief, and a crook because of this allowance.

It will cost almost as much as I get out of my mileage allowance to pay for the printing and mailing out of one ordinary set of speeches in which I attempt to defend Congress and myself against these unwarranted assaults. I will send out one set of speeches this summer that will cost me in actual cash more than twice as much as this mileage allowance.

My railroad ticket alone for my wife and two children and myself to visit Georgia the last of this month will cost me in cash more than twice my mileage for this year, and I will not get the allowance paid during this year until next December.

I wish there was no mileage allowance so that there would be no such opportunity for anyone to apply the name of thief, leech, crook, and so forth, and so on, to Members of Congress and United States Senators, both now living and who in the past have served so well and honorably and now have gone on to the Great Beyond.

The members of the Georgia Legislature get 10 cents a mile traveling expenses for only a few days' service. Considering the length of time they serve and the length of time Members of Congress actually serve each year, the members of the Georgia house and senate get five or more times as much mileage allowance per mile as Members of Congress.

I certainly do not criticize these good men of my State or any other State where mileage is allowed.

I am just wondering how anyone who has served in the Georgia Legislature or has friends or brothers who have served there can find it in his heart to bitterly criticize those, both living and dead, who serve and have served in Congress and who have been allowed much less pay per mile than were allowed our good friends present and past who served honorably and well in our State general assembly.

Another allowance that has been severely criticized is that of clerical assistance. I do not have a relative on my clerical force, but am honest when I say that I can see no valid objections to a relative doing this work, provided always genuine service is rendered for the salary.

The work in a Congressman's office in many instances is of the most confidential nature. Nothing can be more confidential than the medical record or other personal record of veterans and others who every day apply to Congressmen for help.

Again there is no place on earth where loyalty counts for more than in a Congressman's office. The secretary with the greatest loyalty always renders the greatest possible service to the people whom the Member represents. What our people want is service. It is infinitely better for a Member to have his wife or brother in his office rendering real, honest-to-goodness service rather than disloyal clerks who are not giving value received, and instead of helping the Member and his people are either purposely or negligently doing harm to all concerned.

No one would criticize a father for bringing his son along to help do a plumbing job or to help split rails on the farm.

No one would criticize an editor because his wife and child helped him set the type, unless it was for letting them do too much work.

Why should not that editor if elected to Congress employ his relative to help him make a success in his office work, provided that relative renders real service for the pay and more nearly gives value received for the money than anyone else?

I do not hear any criticism of the lawyer whose daughter is his stenographer or of the judge who helps his son get a job or helps his son get into a good partnership and thus get good cases and a good practice or who as judge tries his son's cases.

Why should a lawyer or judge if elected to Congress not use the very best available clerical help, regardless of whether that help is related to him or not?

Of course, it is wrong if any money is paid to anyone who does not give value received in return. This is true regardless of whether the party is a relative or merely a political helper or other person who does not render value received.

It is not at all necessary for a clerk to earn his or her full salary by his or her own actual work any more than a contractor earns the full contract price of constructing a building by his own labor alone.

He must earn the contract price by his own labor, and the labor of those he employs and the cost of material he must put in the building under his contract.

I understand many Members give their clerks all the allowance and then let the clerk pay for all other clerical help which the clerks can not handle personally, such as multigraphing and scores of items too numerous to mention.

Each Member has his own idea about his office work. Some want a clerk or clerks who will undertake to relieve the Member of every responsibility except that of a legislative nature. Some require much more stenographic work than others. In other words, every Member has his own idea as to how he wants his office work handled. Some few Members do not use the full amount allowed for clerical help and leave the balance in the Treasury. Many are wealthy and can pay their clerks out of their own money if they think it is a good political move.

It has been generally reported that some of the wealthier Members let their clerks have the full clerical allowance and also the Member's full salary. Of course they are making their millions in other ways than as a salary.

But those of us who are poor men should use this allowance in the way to get the best results for the people whom we represent. When the entire allowance is paid to one or two persons with them to pay for all additional clerical help which the Member may request, controversy may easily arise, and I understand does arise, as to how much money the clerk or clerks should pay out for this additional help.

So far as I am concerned, I find the best way is to agree just what each clerk shall do and then pay him that full amount and let him keep the full amount agreed upon.

It is much better for all concerned that each clerk know exactly what he is to receive and keep, exactly what he is to do, and that the Member know what amount he can spend for additional clerical help before he begins to spend his own salary for this line of work. I can properly and profitably use for my people much more clerical allowance than I get, and yet recently I voted to cut this pay and am sure this cut will pass.

I wish I had sufficient clerical allowance to hire some legal help in each county to help veterans and others get their claims in proper shape. I would like to pay for some newspaper space in all my local papers so that from time to time I could give valuable information to the public—not of a political nature—as to rights of the farmers, the veterans, and public generally. I wish I had enough money to experiment in the sale of some farm products of my section directly from producer to consumer. I could very easily use here in Washington the services of a good young lawyer all the time to handle matters of a legal nature which pass through my office.

The allowance is not sufficient for these purposes. As it is, I work from 12 to 14 and 15 hours a day, personally handle all the legal and complicated matters, do much of my own clerical work, use a typewriter when necessary, and endeavor to give the very best possible clerical and office help to my people.

After all, it is a matter of service. If the party who is on the pay roll is rendering value received to the public, all is well and good; but if the party is not earning his salary, the public is mistreated, regardless of whether the clerk is a relative of the Congressman or the relative of some political boss or the relative of some one who got the job for him by a political pull.

For my part, I may say, for many hours each day I personally do the secretarial work of my office without any stenographer or clerk. Most of the day I have two clerks in the office. Then, again, I need the help of a half dozen or more clerks or assistants. When Congress is not in session I generally keep my Washington office open with two clerks and hire additional help down home.

I am sure most Members get the best possible service for their districts from this very necessary allowance; and if some errors of judgment are made by a few, the entire membership should not be condemned.

The all-consuming question is whether or not the Member is heart and soul for his people and is he day and night and all the time in every way possible doing his very best for his people? Is he and his clerical force loyal to his people and his Nation and not a traitor to those he represents and for whom they should labor?

In these remarks I shall not attempt to answer all the numerous unfair, misrepresentations that are viciously hurled at Members of Congress by those who are unable to dominate all legislation. This would necessitate the writing of a book.

The great financial interests which dominate the big newspapers are more guilty than anyone else of the awful offense of precipitating the greatest financial depression and the most human suffering in the history of the world. These very people are doing everything possible to direct the attention of the public away from their awful record of guilt. This is actuated by the criminal design to protect themselves at the expense of others, and to force Congress into passing many vicious laws unfair to the public and in furtherance of the awful orgy of plunder and robbery by these malefactors of all humanity.

During the World War and since, the rich became immensely rich and there sprang up many, many more millionaires and multimillionaires than ever before. This all happened in spite of the appalling loss of life and property as the result of the war. All this can only mean the common average citizen not only suffered all the loss of life and property destroyed during the war but even what property he had left was, in most instances, simply stolen from him by the crowd that did not fight but who profiteered, plundered, and robbed while their countrymen were fighting and dying.

There were already many laws under which the rich could plunder the poor; many more have since been enacted. The wealth of the world has practically been taken from the poorer class and either destroyed or delivered into the hands of the very rich, who are hoarding it and letting the common people suffer and die in the greatest depression the world ever experienced.

Let us briefly try to visualize the tremendous loss by the World War and by the exploitation of the common people by the big rich during and since the war. The human mind is dazed by and can not at all grasp the loss caused by the World War.

It has been determined that if all those who lost their lives as the result of the World War were alive and marched single file past a certain point all day long from daylight until dark it would require four and one-half years for them to pass the designated point, and that for every life lost there was $18,000 of property wasted and destroyed.

If $1,000 had been burned every three minutes since the birth of Christ, no more money would have been burned by this time than was destroyed by the World War.

While this tremendous loss was taking place international bankers and monopolistic profiteers were getting possession of practically all of the wealth of the world that was not destroyed. Is there any wonder a panic came? Is there any wonder these profiteers and their subsidized press wish to get the gaze of the public away from them and these awful facts?

Now, in order to cover their own awful and dastard crimes and in an effort to force Congress to give them a further strangle hold on the throats of the common people, these profiteers are resorting to every possible unfair and false criticism of Members of Congress.

This gang seeks to blacken the name of every Member who will not do their bidding, and by putting up campaign funds by organization and in the press they hold up as patriots of the first order those Members who get their orders from Wall Street and act accordingly.

Is there any wonder why these malefactors of good government and honest men and women do not want Members of Congress to be allowed to make reply on the floor of Congress through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and through free official mail service?

Can anyone fail to see the motive that prompts these modern pirates to oppose every move to advise the public of their outrageous crimes? They control most of the big newspapers, much of the radio service, and entirely too much of Congress, and desire that the common people have no voice in either the press, the radio service, or in legislative halls.

I knew full well my bill would be attacked bitterly and severely when I introduced the measure to save for the common people, the laboring man, the farmer, and the children, the greatest means of education, information, and communication of all time—the radio and the motion picture.

The radio itself was used four years ago to broadcast misrepresentations of my bill throughout the length and breadth of the country.

These criticisms at that time were made in reprisal against me for criticizing the Republican tariff bill.

More recently some of the big newspapers and periodicals, especially the Saturday Evening Post and other Curtis publications, have again taken up the misrepresentation of this bill and the vilification of me.

While I have great faith in the bill and am very hopeful that good legislation may some day soon be enacted along this line, I feel there are so many vitally important questions now before Congress that it is not best to push this bill at this time. For this reason, in spite of the many unfair attacks that have been made on me by the big newspapers, motion-picture concerns, and radio monopolies, I have refrained from attempting to pass this bill at this session of Congress. I reintroduced the bill at the beginning of this Congress, not because I felt it was an opportune time to pass it but because I did not want the radio, motion-picture, and other certain trusts and monopolies to feel that I had in any sense abandoned the fight for the real purposes of this bill.

I am only discussing this bill now because the vilification which these trusts are heaping on it demands, at least, some disclosure of the real truth concerning this measure.

To begin with, the bill does not appropriate any sum of money but only authorizes the appropriation of such money as may be necessary. If the bill should pass, only such money then could be appropriated as received the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, the general House Committee on Appropriations, the House itself, and then similar committees of the Senate, the Senate, and finally the President.

So the misrepresentations as to the amount of appropriation included in the bill are fully exploded. These papers fail to tell the whole truth, and tell the people that the measure provides for free schoolbooks, and for radio and motion pictures, at much less cost to the public, making our people more patriotic rather than more criminal.

The bill would save these great agencies for all the people rather than let the monopolies use them, at tremendous cost to all the people, for the purpose of misrepresentation and the creation of a lower standard of morals.

This bill provides for the freest discussion of the rights and questions of interest to all the people and gives the poor people the use of the radio to present their ideas of government without hindrance and as fully as the richest man in the Nation. The bill seeks to destroy monopolies and to set up the will of the common people.

I shudder when I realize that we are nearing the time when monopolies will own practically everything, when we will have chain farming, chain banking, and chain everything else. When the big newspapers, the radio, the moving pictures, and even the books taught in our schools will be only such as are approved by the great financial interests; and our people will be treading the wine press of human misery and slavery from which there will be little or no liberation.

Of course, the big movie interests, which are largely responsible for the present great crime wave and which extract more money per year from our people for debauching our children than this entire program would cost, bitterly oppose my bill. They prefer, at tremendous cost to our fathers and mothers, to use their vile pictures to undo all the good influence of our homes and of our schools, make our children hate all that is highest and best, and clog our courts and prisons with young men and women who are worthy of a better fate.

The big radio interests join with the motion-picture interests in this fight. With them it is not a question of serving the children and helping their fathers and mothers build up and maintain a great citizenship. All these interests seek is money and more money, regardless of whether their methods produce ladies and gentlemen or beings in human form steeped in sin and crime.

The great interests oppose my bill and all similar moves for the dissemination of the truth. They prefer to control all means of communication and information to the end that they may without hindrance promulgate their ideas and destroy those who will not be subservient to them and their kind. The greatest salaries in the world are paid to movie actors and the greatest fortunes are made by motion-picture concerns. Who pays all this? The little boys and girls and their parents. What do they get in return? They get dirt and filth and the lowest possible conception of life.

Would it not be a thousand times better for clean, high-class, educational pictures to be furnished for far less cost to our people? To-day the common people are paying fabulous sums to the movies to undermine the home and its influence, set at naught the teachings of our fathers and mothers, undermine all law, and destroy our form of Government.

Why not pay much less for more love of father and mother, more respect for and love of home, more love of country and the God of our fathers? The newer and deeper patriotism would be worth the price. The higher and purer ideals instilled in our children would be worth many times the cost.

The savings of court costs and expense of crime would more than pay for all the expenditure.

I would, if possible, bring all the beauty of all the earth, all the music of all time, and all the blessings of all eternity and dump them in the laps of our boys and girls and their parents of the farm and of the humble home of honest labor. This can not be done fully in this life, but may be done in a small way, I hope and pray, by proper control or ownership by the people of the God-given blessings of earth and space and sky as exemplified in these modern inventions.

It will be seen that my bill carefully safeguards the right of each organization or community to select and approve the class and character of information or entertainments furnished for its own members or citizens. Anything else is dangerous to the American home, will destroy the moral stamina of our citizens, and will work the undoing of our Government.

The misrepresentations of the big papers concerning my bill have gone so far until some of my friends were led to believe my bill is contrary to the principle of separation of church and state. There is no danger in the bill along this line. My bill gives the churches the same rights as other organizations. Many laws go much farther and give special rights to churches. Special reduced postal rates are given to church and fraternal newspapers, literature, and periodicals. Church edifices alone in the United States, to say nothing of other church property, to the amount of $3,839,500,610 are relieved of all taxes.

Millions and billions are spent annually on public parks, orchestras, libraries, periodicals, and in numerous other ways for instruction, education, and entertainment. Only a few people enjoy these at great expense to whole people. I seek to make the best of all this available to all the people at the least possible cost.

I think my bill is good. I may be mistaken about it. The fight being made on it by the big interests confirms my faith in its provisions. I apologize for taking up so much time on these matters, but I feel it is dangersous to let too many false criticisms go without reply.

Before I conclude, let us take a peep at some of the inconsistencies of some of those who are criticizing Congress.

Nothing is more inconsistent, in so far as a newspaper is concerned, than the contention that while the United States Government is handling the newspapers and other periodicals of the country, through the Postal Service, at an actual loss of between ninety and a hundred million dollars per year, that the same Government should not handle its own official mail—parts of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD included—without cost to the official.

For the purpose of emphasis, I repeat it comes with poor grace for these big papers, especially, which get approximately $100,000,000 a year graft or subsidy from the Government in the matter of postal rates in the handling of paid advertisements, unfair and untruthful criticisms of Members of Congress, and equally vicious propaganda against the rights of the common people, to object to Members of Congress answering this awful, untruthful vilification and sending it through the mail at an actual cost of about one-fifteenth of the amount actually lost by the Government in handling the newspapers of the country.

I am not criticizing the small local papers for taking advantage of the free-in-county postage or other cheap rates enjoyed by these little papers of our counties. I am defending them along with Members of Congress and others who must go up against the unfair criticisms and fight of the big metropolitan press.

If the big papers could not send their papers or periodicals thousands of miles through the mail practically free, all this slush would not load down our mails at the expense of the taxpayers and untold millions of dollars now paid out to these big papers for $10,000-a-week and similarly expensive advertisements would go to the small weekly paper.

I favor the cheap postal rate for the country paper, so it can help overcome the false propaganda of the subsidized and monopolistic press of New York and other similar centers.

I am whole-heartedly in favor of the cheapest possible postal rates for county papers and for our State papers within the State; I favor the franking privilege of Members of Congress, and I am in favor of every other reasonable means of overcoming falsehood and letting the people know the truth.

The big magazines and periodicals which circulate so much false doctrine and misinformation enjoy a subsidy from the Government that staggers the imagination of those who now will have to help pay the bill by the change of first-class postage rates from 2 to 3 cents per ordinary letter.

Let us look at just a few figures. During a recent 10-year period the Postal Service of our Nation handled 14,590,410,689 pounds of this newspaper mail and received for the service $292,900,498.17. I find that if the average citizens had mailed this same poundage in one-fourth ounce letters the postage would have been $17,504,123,729.24, or more than five times as much as the newspapers paid.

This difference in favor of the newspapers, arising during one 10-year period since the war, would pay the balance due the World War veterans over and over more than five times. It is sufficient to pay the balance of the public debt.

If the 3-cent postage rate now being put into force had been in effect the difference, of course, would have been 50 per cent more. If the newspapers should pay as much per pound in postage during the next two years as the public will pay for similar poundage under the vicious 3-cent postage rate, the additional amount would more than pay the balance of adjusted compensation now due the veterans of the World War.

And yet, instead of favoring an increase of their postage, these papers oppose the payment of the soldiers' bonus, favor the increase of letter postage from 2 to 3 cents to pay the deficit caused by them, and will continue to unfairly abuse those who will not go with them and their gang in the sponsoring of this newspaper graft and similarly vicious outrages.

Let us for just a minute refer to the Curtis Publishing Co., which published in its Saturday Evening Post the article criticizing my free school radio educational bill.

Our people pay out of their pockets salaries and profits to the large newspaper organizations so large as to stagger the imagination, while our Government, through the Post Office Department, is losing $3,000,000 per year hauling the publications of this one concern, namely, the Curtis Publishing Co.

Think of it, reliable information is available to the effect that this very paper, with all this Government subsidy, gets $10,000 per week for one double-page advertisement, $5,000 per week for single-page advertisements, and similarly large pay for all its advertising space.

The farmers and the average private citizens are being destroyed by these subsidies, exorbitant salaries of officials, of large business concerns, and an economic system which is slavery of the most vicious type. The common people pay for all this expensive advertising and for all these salaries and subsidies.

The big dailies look on approvingly and complacently while our Government donates billions upon top of billions of the people's money to foreign nations. Not a protest is heard from the metropolitan press when it is disclosed that $30,000,000,000 have been recently swindled out of the American people and small banks by the big banks unloading this amount of worthless foreign securities on our people, with enormous commissions and profits to these pirates of the banking world.

Nothing was said by them while these blackest of all financial crimes transferred enough American money to foreign nations to pay the balance of adjusted compensation due the World War veterans again and again twenty times.

Yet the big press says "refuse to pay the World War veterans their pittance for all they have endured; but create the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and turn over to these identical financial pirates the people's money in $200,000,000 blocks." They say unanimously "the great banks and other enormous financial institutions must be relieved of all burdens of taxation, such as income, estate, and inheritance taxes, and the sales tax must do the work by taxing need, want, poverty, and despair, instead of wealth, plenty, income, and swollen, stolen enormous fortunes." And yet this big-newspaper, big-interest mob seeks to ruthlessly murder those who do not do its will and who in spite of their threats vote for the best interest of the American people as pointed out by conscientious convictions.

The big subsidized press and the gang of international and other Wall Street bankers that buys them with stolen loot attempt to decoy the attention of an outraged and indignant public away from the oceans tied on to oceans of their own guilt and to fasten attention on the fleeting vapor of some imaginary indiscretion of some public official.

Those who stole and now control the wealth and destiny of the world are seeking to cause all humanity to look for the causes of the present depression in a few grains of inconsequential shifting sands instead of in the mighty mountains piled upon never-ending mountains of their own awful crime and guilt. With the blackest crime of all ages fastened on them and their kind and with their hands dripping with the innocent blood of millions and billions of their fellow men, dead and living, these financial enemies of the race seek to destroy those who will neither join their gang nor help them in the concealment of their own awful calamitous guilt.

Thus it is I am most anxious to save for the common people the radio, the motion pictures, the independent small country newspaper, the independent educational system of our country schools, and the absolute right of Members of Congress to speak for the masses of our people and broadcast their speeches to all the people.

Without these agencies there would be neither freedom of the press nor freedom of speech, and there would be the immediate disappearance of freedom of religion and all other God-given constitutional rights.

There is and can be no freedom of a subsidized money-owned press. There can be no free speech without a free press and the right of the people's representatives in Congress and elsewhere to not only speak for them but to let the world know what is said and done in Congress and elsewhere.

We must fight as never before to regain what has been stolen from our people, to right the wrong so far as possible and to build stronger our every bulwark of liberty and honest government so that such a thing will never occur again.

Let me repeat what I said in the beginning of these remarks. Let those who wish to criticize Members of Congress single out the one against whom the dart is aimed and specifically point out wherein his official record is thought to be bad.

I implore those who wish to attack me to please point out wherein they feel they would have improved the record I made, which of my votes are believed by them to be wrong, what utterances of mine in debate are opposed by them, and what proposals of mine are offensive to them.

Many, many thousands of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tell of my work here. I am, though, sorely disappointed over what has been accomplished by Congress during all these years. I am glad that in the midst of opposition and criticism I have stood for the right as pointed out by the dictates of my own conscience.

I have fought for much that has not been accomplished, but which I hope may yet be brought into being before many more months. Just here let me name briefly some principles for which I have contended, which I now propose to the platform builders of both the Democratic and Republican Parties, as well as those who wish to run for Congress this year and all who may now or hereafter be interested either in their own political preferment or in the welfare of the American people.

I respectfully submit the following suggestions:

First. I favor the submission to the States of an amendment to the Federal Constitution to provide for the head of each family an exemption from all taxes of a reasonable amount of realty and personalty for a comfortable home when so used.

Second. I favor legislation bringing about an effective control of the production and marketing of farm products by the producers, by a contract system, allotment plan, cooperative marketing, or other proper device, to the end that the price of farm products may be elevated, controlled, and stabilized by the farmers as fully and completely as the production, marketing, and prices of manufactured and other articles of barter and sale are controlled by manufacturers and other producers. This, and only this, will put the farmers on a parity with other enterprises and constitute real farm relief.

Third. Except in cases of extreme emergency, I favor the raising of all revenues for the Federal Government from impost duties; tariffs; estate, inheritance, and income taxes, to the end that the several States may levy and collect excise and general sales taxes if it is desired by the State governments to do so in lieu of the whole or any part of the now burdensome State ad valorem or property tax.

Fourth. I favor the completion as soon as possible of the system of waterways along the Atlantic seaboard for use by barges and other small watercraft, and the similar system of inland waterways along the Gulf of Mexico, including the construction of a connecting link between the two systems across south Georgia and north Florida along the most practical route.

Fifth. I favor the working out through Government aid of a system of selling fruits, vegetables, and other food products of the farm, orchard, and dairy more directly from the producer to the consumer, thus giving better, fresher, and more wholesome food to the consumers at less cost and at the same time securing a much more reasonable price for the producers.

Sixth. I favor the immediate solution of the transportation problem. The railroads should be saved as a part and parcel of the economic structure of our States and Nation. They should be given a square deal, to the end that they may not only furnish full and adequate transportation facilities to all the people but help furnish employment to labor, bear a large part of the tax burden of the States and Nation, and generally constitute a most important factor in the financial structure of the country.

To these ends I favor the immediate enactment of legislation putting bus and truck transportation under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with such laws, however, as will prevent unfair treatment of any transportation line or any consolidations or mergers or other manipulations inimical to the general welfare.

Seventh. I favor an arrangement between a proper governmental agency and all holders of long-term loans against farm property and all holders of farm property recently taken over by foreclosure proceedings, whereby all farm lands so taken over, together with all lands now covered by long-term loans, will be returned to original owners or held by original owners without foreclosures, except where such arrangement is not practical or not desired by original owner. In order to carry this fully into effect, I favor the issuance and sale of such Government bonds as may be necessary, the bonds for this purpose to be secured by the loans, lands, or other property purchased, handled, or sold in the carrying of this program into full effect.

These suggestions are not at all exhaustive. They show, though, how I feel about these most vital issues. At a later date, and before adjournment of this session, I hope to discuss these issues more fully.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to the first portion of the request, that for the balance of to-morrow the Private Calendar be considered, but it is too hard on the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and other Members who work on the Private Calendar, to sit here, under a terrible strain, and work on that bunch of bills during the day session and then again at night also.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. There will be no session on Saturday, will there?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; there will be a session on Saturday. There is a limit to what an individual can do, Mr. Speaker, and men will be dropping off here again. They are not able to stand the day and night session work, and then keep their offices going, hence I shall object. The first part of the gentleman's request, that we consider private bills during the rest of the day, I do not object to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall divide the request, and I hope that the gentleman will not object to considering the Private Calendar under the new rule on Saturday.

Mr. BLANTON. Not at all.

Mr. RAINEY. With the understanding that no controversial matters are to come up. I understand the gentlman will not make a point of no quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Speaker, we will not make any such reservation.

Mr. BLANTON. That is one lever necessary to protect the country sometimes. I shall not waive the right to exercise that privilege, and reserve the right to make such a point of order whenever it appears to be necessary.

Mr. RAINEY. The only reason I suggested a night session was because I thought some gentleman on Saturday might raise a point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. It may be that some question would arise where we would be compelled to make that point of no quorum as the only means left to stop some bad bill from passing. This new rule under which we must operate on Private Calendar day is going to double, and even treble, the amount of work that we who watch this calendar must perform. Even after we do the hard, grinding work it is going to be absolutely impossible to stop all of the bad bills, and some of them are going to get by, and the Public Treasury is going to suffer. It is going to be necessary to have our entire objecting force on the floor at all times while the Private Calendar is being considered, and I know that if it is taken up at night sessions with the membership worked down, some of our forces are going to be absent. And thus it is because I deem it necessary to protect the Treasury that I object to such a proposed night session, and for no other reason. I work, myself, every night, as I work afterwards in my office, even when I attend some function, hence I do not object for any personal reason.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas, I amend my unanimous-consent request by omitting the night session.

Mr. HASTINGS. Reserving the right to object, where do we begin on the Private Calendar?

Mr. RAINEY. The rule provides that the calendar shall be called in numerical order. That is a matter for the Speaker.

Mr. HASTINGS. But do we begin where we left off?

Mr. RAINEY. I shall not pass on that, because the rule provides that the Private Calendar shall be called in numerical order.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Under the rule, if there be no agreement, where would we begin on the Private Calendar? Will we begin at the first number or where we left off on the last call?

The SPEAKER. Under the new rules, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. If the Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], the gentleman desired to consider bills in the House as in Committee of the Whole, from the time the flood control bill is disposed of until the House takes a recess.

Mr. RAINEY. Until the House adjourns. I amend the request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Until the House adjourns. One objection would suffice. Is that correct?

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand the request that way, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAINEY. No. Under the new rule, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Under the general rules of the House, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, and will start at the beginning of the calendar.

The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that upon the conclusion of the consideration of the flood control bill on to-morrow, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, and to continue until the House adjourns. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARGUMENT AGAINST GRANTING A RULE ON H. R. 11677

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and that I be permitted to print a statement which I filed with the Committee on Rules, together with a financial exhibit referring to that statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, what does the statement cover?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. It is with reference to H. R. 11677, the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that no exhibit can be printed in the RECORD without special permission from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. It is simply a condensed financial statement that I have called for from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. It would be proper to print such a statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there was so much confusion that I did not understand exactly the gentleman's request. I thought I heard the gentleman mention something about the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. There is a rule pending, or a request for a rule from the Committee on Rules, with reference to the so-called Rayburn bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I filed a statement with the committee to-day in opposition to the rule. I am asking leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including that statement, together with the financial statement referred to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has gone before the Committee on Rules to request a rule to bring before the House H. R. 11677.

Being very much opposed to this measure, I have filed a statement with the Committee on Rules, believing that such rule should not be granted. In order that the House itself may be able to understand what this bill is, as I see it, I have asked leave to print my protest in the RECORD with exhibits.

ARGUMENT AGAINST GRANTING A RULE ON H. R. 11677

I can not support H. R. 11677 because, to my mind, it is class legislation—wholly a prorailroad measure. I am not opposed to scrapping the present Esch-Cummins law. It, too, has always been regarded a prorailroad measure.

The bill before us repeals, in part, the Sherman antitrust law in recognizing holding companies; fixes a new rule of rate making certainly not opposed by the railroads; pigeonholes the La Follette valuation plan; repeals section 15a, the recapture clause; and hands over $360,000,000 to rich roads, bankers, big corporations, coal and steel companies, and Morgan interests. To my mind, it contains not one single added benefit for the business man, laboring man, or the farmer who must pay the freight and fares.

WHY GUARANTY CLAUSE FAILED

The so-called guaranty provision of the Esch-Cummins law was fathered and pushed through Congress by the security owners, and actively supported by railroad executives, because they thought that the recapture provision would prove to be in fact a guaranty to the railroads of 6 per cent on property value. The late Senator La Follette, farm organizations, and the public generally believed that it contained a guaranty. In fact, so did the security owners themselves. Consequently, La Follette and many others, including myself, opposed it. Now, the reason that the security owners and railroad interests generally are for repeal is because the so-called guaranty has not worked as they hoped it would. Falling off of passenger traffic, competing transportation agencies, floods, droughts, crop failures are given as reasons why the railroads as a whole did not realize the profits they expected from this apparent guaranty. But the real reason it failed is because it violated a fundamental principle; it intended to give the railroad interests a permanent fixed profit, a special privilege. It died of its own poison.

SPECIAL INTERESTS OPPOSE RECAPTURE

Why do security owners and railway executives favor this bill? Two reasons are on the surface. They would escape the payment in the future of from thirty to forty millions annually, and get the three hundred and sixty millions due the Government in recapture liability.

The big shippers are for repeal, because, as they said in the hearings, through their attorney, they expect a special benefit. The attorney was asked, "Could you tell, in just a word, how all these things are going to help the shippers, briefly?" He answered, "They are going to help the shippers because they will help to improve the railroad credit."

He was asked, "Is that all?" His answer was: "That is one reason. They are going to help the shippers, because they will assist the railroads in getting back where they can buy some of our goods." (P. 100, hearings.)

Note that, throughout, his testimony is prorailroad. Nothing is directly presented to show how this gift of three hundred and sixty millions would redound to the shippers generally.

Naturally, the rich Class I railroads—those whose annual income is no less than a million dollars—plead, as did the representative of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, for "fairness to the railroads" and the "unconditional and retroactive repeal of the recapture provisions."

As an illustration of the sheer selfishness of these railroads who appeared before the committee pleading for charity, let us take this particular road. It owes the Government in round numbers $11,000,000 under the recapture clause. (See hearings, p. 556, No. 8.) Its corporate surplus—cash or other assets after all debts are subtracted—December 31, 1930, was approximately four hundred and five millions. It had increased to this figure from one hundred and seventy-two millions in 1920, and even from three hundred and ninety-eight millions at the close of 1929, showing indisputably its increasing wealth. The dividends declared on its stock have constantly increased from 6 per cent on common and a total amount declared in the sum of $19,649,795 in the year 1920, to 10 per cent on common and a total amount declared in the sum of $30,380,401 in the year 1930. (P. 378, hearings.)

Can not such a road afford to pay the Government its just due—in this case only $11,000,000—of the excess earnings that have enabled it to show such large corporate increases? Does this road need a gift?

Now, let us examine the data in connection with other roads:

Name of road	Estimated[1] recapture liability, 1920–1930	Corporate surplus, 1930	Amount dividends, 1930	Rate per cent common dividends, 1930	Page of hearings

Of course the National Association of Railroad and Utility Commissioners is for the bill. Bear in mind that some members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are also members of the national association. We do not know how much their action is influenced by the commission, if at all; but we do know that their representative stated in the hearings that—

The association comes here to support, in the main, the recommendations * * * which have been made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is for it. This commission, to my mind, has been exceedingly dilatory in determining and taking means to collect the recapture liabilities. I have been led to wonder if my colleague, Representative JAMES M. BECK, member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, was far from right when last summer, in connection with the "15 per cent case," he threatened investigation of the commission if it did not act with more speed. He called it a "Commission of Circumlocution" (Washington Post, July 15, 1931). Even Commissioner Woodlock, while still one of their number, said in 1930, in a dissenting opinion referring mainly to valuation:

I am driven to the supposition that the "unworkability" of the law of the land arises less from the difficulty inherent in its application than from an indisposition to apply it and accept the results. (Special Report of Interstate Commerce Commission to Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, May 17, 1930.)

The simple fact is, as is apparent all the way through, that the commission has snarled itself up because of its own inactivity and errors in judgment. Now, it is asking for authority virtually to do as it pleases. It is proposed to substitute men for law, discretion for direction, opinion for principle. As Commissioner Eastman testified, with reference to one of the bills which is virtually embodied in this measure, "the commission is to be guided" by "a barometer of earnings," and he added, "although in no inflexible way." But the bill itself shows that the way is wholly flexible, and the commission is relieved entirely of the recapture work and practically of valuation. In short, in this measure the commission is given carte blanche as to making rates, except for the suggestion that they must be sure that the railroads get enough.

TIME AND COST TO COMPLETE RECAPTURE NEGLIGIBLE

Why should this valuable work of recapture now be scrapped when the work is nearly completed? Commissioner Eastman, when asked at the hearings how long it would take to complete the recapture work, answered:

Our bureau of valuation estimates that the time required would be up to July 1, 1935. (Hearings, p. 438.)

As to the cost of recapture, which has been made to appear so formidable, I quote Commissioner Lewis's recent statement in the hearings (1932) on independent offices appropriations:

We estimate that the net cost allocable to recapture for the completion of the work [meaning the ascertained and computed three hundred and sixty millions] * * * will be $4,000,000 over a period ending June 30, 1935 (p. 293).

Is it wise economy to waste what has already been spent in millions of dollars and labor of years by Government accountants in complying with the law when it will take only three years more and require only four millions to recuperate three hundred and sixty millions?

AN ADDITIONAL FAVOR TO THE ROADS

Another provision which will be affected by the repeal is the requirement that the railroads must keep one-half of the excess earnings in their own reserve fund. The law now gives them this amount for the specific purpose of "paying dividends or interest on its stocks, bonds, or other securities, or rent for leased roads," and for no other purpose. The other half is allotted to the Government for another purpose—that is, to create a contingent fund for "making loans to carriers to meet expenditures for capital account or to refund maturing securities originally issued for capital account, or by purchasing transportation equipment and facilities and leasing the same to carriers." So that by repealing this part of section 15a, Congress not only gives away the contingent fund that the Government should be holding, which now amounts to three hundred and sixty millions, but also releases an equal amount which the railroads should be holding as trust funds for specified purposes. These purposes were intended to strengthen the roads so as to keep them from asking for more favors from the Government.

GIVES AWAY TRUST FUNDS

It might be a question whether the railroads' one-half of the recapture is a trust fund. The majority report does refer to it as funds "in trust." Unquestionably, however, the three hundred and sixty millions due the Government are trust funds. The interstate commerce act so states. It says that "any carrier which receives such funds in excess of their returns shall hold the same 'as trustee' for and shall pay it to the United States."

The Supreme Court has ruled that this money is a trust fund:

The statute declared the carrier to be only a trustee for the excess over a fair return received by it. Though in its possession, the excess never becomes its property and it accepts custody of the products of all the rates with this understanding. (Dayton-Goose Creek v. United States, 263 U. S. 456.)

To whom would these trust funds be given by this measure? Not to the weaker roads for whose benefit they were to be held in trust and to whom loans were to be made from this emergency trust fund; not to the farmers and business men who paid the money into the trust funds in the form of higher freight rates and passenger fares. These trust funds would be given to the roads that collected these fares and rates from the people. The Supreme Court said "the excess never becomes its property and it accepts custody of the products of all the rates with this understanding." (Dayton-Goose Creek v. United States, supra.)

Think of it! These trust funds, by this measure, are to be a gift to the trustees, custodians, collectors! If they are to be diverted from their intended purpose, why not turn these trust funds into the Treasury for all the people?

THE LID IS OFF

This bill takes the lid off. There is a limit now to the earnings of railroads. They are not to charge rates that will net them more than 6 per cent. If they do, one-half is to be a reserve fund held for themselves for a specific purpose, and the other half a trust fund paid into the Treasury to constitute a contingent fund, now estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be $360,000,000. By this measure the earnings may be not only 6 per cent but 60 per cent if they could make it. They may charge what the traffic will bear. The public's only protection is that the Interstate Commerce Commission, unrestrained by any specific direction, but prompted to watch that the railroads get profits enough, will watch the "barometer of earnings." In fact, this bill, in "restraining" excess fares and rates, makes the sky the limit.

BENEFICIARIES WOULD BE RICH ROADS

The big coal and steel roads are principal contributors to this recapture trust. A group of four coal roads operating in the Virginias, part of which are controlled by the Van Sweringen interests, are estimated by the commission as owing this Government about $102,000,000.

Estimated recapture liabilities

Chesapeake & Ohio	$47,779,611
Hocking Valley	5,241,114
Norfolk & Western	42,106,462
Virginian	7,364,770
	102,491,957

(Hearings, p. 556, Nos. 1, 2, 14, and 15.)

This is 28 per cent of the total amount of estimated recapture liability. From a group of roads controlled by the United States Steel Corporation is an estimated recapture liability of more than fifty-two millions (see total, hearings, p. 436), or 14 per cent of the whole. Together these make 42 per cent of all the recapture figured to be due the Government for the period covering 1920–1930.

During this time the total net income (meaning profit after interest, dividends, and all fixed charges are deducted) of this group of coal roads has been more than five hundred and fifty-four millions, and of the group of steel roads one hundred and seventy-three millions. The corporate surpluses for the year 1930 were, for the coal group, four hundred and thirty-one millions, and for the steel group one hundred and seventy millions. The coal group paid dividends on their common stock in 1930, ranging from 8 per cent to 12 per cent. The rate of dividends of a few of the steel roads is astounding. The Bessemer & Lake Erie was paying from 1920 to 1930, inclusive, dividends ranging from 150 per cent to the peaks of 500 per cent in 1928 and 1929, and 400 per cent in 1930. (Hearings, pp. 373 and 434–436.)

Is it the will of the people or the will of the United States Congress that these rich coal and steel roads, through repeal of recapture, shall be given a "dole" of 42 per cent of these trust funds, amounting to one hundred and fifty-four millions, that belong to the Government?

Of the recapture liability estimated at three hundred and sixty millions, ten millions have been paid. (Exhibit I.) Assuredly, to take these ten millions already collected with interest (in all thirteen millions) out of the United States Treasury and make it a subsidy to the rich railroads would be not only a "dole" but a raid on the Government's trust fund.

VALUATION AS BASIS OF RATES—NOT DISCRETION OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The people's interest will be safeguarded only if valuation is the basis of rates. The bill cuts out rate groups and fair value and leaves as a basis of rate making nothing more definite than "just and reasonable" return based on a system of "bookkeeping" supplied by the railroads. That some check by the Government is necessary for the protection of shippers and the general public is evident from the following quotations from the 1908 Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission as cited by Commissioner Lewis, who for nine years has been in charge of the Bureau of Valuation of the commission:

> It is sufficient for the present purpose to state that no tribunal upon which the duty may be imposed, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, can pass a satisfactory judgment upon the reasonableness of railway rates without taking into account the value of railway property.
> No court, or commission, or accountant, or financial writer would for a moment consider that the present balance-sheet statement purporting to give the "cost of property" suggests, even in a remote degree, a reliable measure either of money invested or of present value. (Pp. 527–528, Hearings.)

A portion of the valuation work is to be kept up, it is true, but may be stored away in a closet to be referred to only if some extraordinary emergency should arise. Under this bill the whole matter of rates would be left to the discretion of a commission, "a purely political tribunal" of 11 men. Rates that are fair are not so likely to come out of a debating society as from the administration of a scientific law.

The work of valuation, urged and sponsored by the late Senator La Follette and by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, is, as Commissioner Lewis has said, "the largest undertaking of valuation the world has ever known." It has enabled the commission and overcapitalized roads to work together for a sounder financial structure. Valuation is essential to every emergency that might arise for railway legislation and railway regulation. Concerning the present status of the work of valuation, Commissioner Lewis said recently:

> * * * the Government is now in the position not only to furnish a valuation base for rates, but equipped to meet any question that might be raised as to confiscation resulting from rates. (Hearings before the subcommittee on appropriations on the Independent Offices bill, p. 281.)

Even now the Interstate Commerce Commission is using valuation as a basis for approving loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This monumental achievement of the late Senator La Follette is to go into a pigeonhole so far as recapture and rate making are concerned because between the commission and the Supreme Court its intended efficacy has been seriously impaired.

Before the Senator died I was expressing to him my discouragement of all reforms by laws where the men who are not favorable to the law would wreck it—make it a failure by mismanagement. "Yes," said he, "see what this Interstate Commerce Commission has done with my railroad valuation."

My opinion is that the commission is to blame because of its failure to present the valuation plan to the courts adequately. The O'Fallon case alone in all this time has gone to the Supreme Court. If legislation is necessary to perfect the La Follette plan, it should be recommended by the committee. But to wreck this legislative structure so nearly completed and so exceedingly necessary would, to my mind, be the height of legislative folly.

As to the cost of completing the work of valuation, I again quote Commissioner Lewis:

> We have already got the records and we have checked these properties up to 1928, and for some roads we have got it up to the end of 1931, and when we get it current, why, a great deal of expense is over, both for the Government and for the carriers. (P. 281, hearings, independent offices appropriation bill.)

Since valuation is nearly completed, and the cost of keeping it up to date is negligible, we should not leave the whole matter of rate making to the discretion of a commission which is directed by a rule requiring them continually to keep railroad interests in mind.

REGULATION OF HOLDING COMPANIES AN EMPTY GESTURE

Twenty-five years ago Wisconsin took the lead in regulating utilities, and recently its legislature has passed the most comprehensive law yet written for the control of holding companies in connection with utilities. The principle embodied in regulating railroad holding companies by the Interstate Commerce Commission, like the principle of regulating the railroads themselves, is not new, but identical with what is applied to the regulation of utilities. Such corporations now control hundreds of millions of the people's money. Prof. William Z. Ripley, director of the Rock Island, said:

> The late unprecedented creation of hierarchies of corporations piled helter-skelter, one upon another—wheels within wheels—is utterly opposed to sound public policy. There is no legal or operating need of it. The rightful interests of shippers, employees, and of owners of railroad securities are all alike put in jeopardy by the practice. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 4, 1932, p. 7357.)

I agree with Prof. Adolph Berle, of Columbia Law School, that "the holding company stands foremost among the so-called legal devices for undue control of corporations" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 4, 1932, p. 7358). The holding company provision in this bill specifically "relieves them from the operation of the 'antitrust law'." (Sec. 2, par. 15.) Their grab-as-grab-can practices are what is called "above our Federal law." For instance, a few big railroad executives with a few big bank executives may constitute a holding company. They may buy and control at will the stock of some road which will be advantageous to the corporation, depress it, inflate it, even force receivership, if necessary. They even manipulate stock as buyer and seller, thereby reaping enormous profits. These fly-by-nights tend towards consolidation, which, regulated or unregulated, destroys healthy competition. This measure, to my mind, authorizes holding companies as a lawful institution by the device of passing a law to regulate them. The only restraint is the arbitrary discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is it wise, I repeat, thus to substitute the government of man for the government of law? Can they stand the pressure? I doubt it. Watch what will happen when the camel gets his nose into the tent. I am opposed to consolidation. I favor prohibiting holding companies, not their recognition as an institution, by passing a law to regulate them.

PLEA OF EMERGENCY NEED IS SPECIOUS

While we are willing to admit that railroads are suffering the pinch of the depression along with the rest of the country, in the shrinkage of their volume of business, are they in any greater financial distress than are practically all other industries? Except for bad management, extravagance, and speculation, they should not be in such dire distress as they would have us believe, for they have been the recipients of stupendous sums of Government money. When they were turned back to private ownership in 1920, they claimed reimbursement of deficit in railway-operating income during Federal control of nearly $29,000,000.

The Government compromised with them by making a total settlement of approximately ten millions. As a six months' guaranty from March 1, 1920, after the termination of Federal control, the Government paid the railroads nearly five hundred and twenty-nine millions. At that time, also, to help the roads over the transition period a revolving fund of $300,000,000 was appropriated from the Treasury. (Source of above figures, annual reports of Interstate Commerce Commission.) To meet the present emergency there could have been a fund available. Had the $360,000,000 due the Government in recapture been collected, as it should have been, there would have been no need for the railroads, demanding a 15 per cent blanket increase on rates or for the Railroad Credit Corporation (the "credit pool"), which was established pursuant to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission of October 16, 1931. Already from this pool the railroads have received a little over four millions, with fourteen and one-fourth millions authorized. All of this comes directly out of increased rates. There would have been no need for that part of the $2,000,000,000 fund of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that is allocated for loans to railroads.

From this Government fund the railroads have already received seventy-seven and one-half millions.

What have the class I roads done with the sixty-six billions that they received during their prosperous period between 1920 and 1930? (Exhibit II.) Only one one-hundred and ninety-eighth part of these revenues is payable to the Government in recapture. If they had conserved this money, they could not now plead that they have no funds with which to pay recapture. As Commissioner Eastman well said, "Undoubtedly a general railroad contingent fund of $300,000,000 or thereabouts would now be very useful if it were available." (Hearings, p. 11.)

Now that this depression has come, this cry for help has gone out and the Congress is to rush to the assistance of the railroads. From a reliable source I quote the following:

Railroads since the 1920 act made the best showing in their history. If we eliminate from the transportation picture those ill-conceived, poorly built, and badly finished parts of our transportation system, we begin to get at the real trouble. Why try to design laws which will saddle on the people of this country a sponsorship for those proverbial "ne'er-do-wells" of the railroad family? There is little that can be done for the professional hobo or that army of unemployed whose only aspiration in life is a handout. It is to those who would work if they could get something to do that our efforts to better the opportunities of the human family are directed.

It is shown below that our really worth-while railroads were treated even generously, in so far as rates and regulations are concerned, during the period subsequent to March 1, 1920, when the so-called transportation act of 1920 became effective.

(1) Average annual dividend rate paid on dividend-yielding stock:

1920 to 1930, 7.30 per cent.
1910 to 1920, 6.94 per cent.
1900 to 1910, 6.20 per cent.
1890 to 1900, 5.40 per cent.

(2) Maximum and minimum dividend rate paid on dividend-yielding stocks:

1920 to 1930, 6.37 per cent in 1924 to 9.02 per cent in 1921.
1910 to 1920, 6.29 per cent in 1916 to 8.03 per cent in 1911.
1900 to 1910, 5.23 per cent in 1900 to 8.07 per cent in 1908.
1890 to 1900, 4.96 per cent in 1899 to 5.74 per cent in 1895.

(3) Average annual per cent of all stock which was on a dividend-yielding basis:

1920 to 1930, 56.92 per cent in 1921 to 76.93 per cent in 1930.
1910 to 1920, 57.30 per cent in 1920 to 67.65 per cent in 1911.
1900 to 1910, 45.66 per cent in 1900 to 67.27 per cent in 1907.
1890 to 1900, 29.83 per cent in 1896 to 45.66 per cent in 1900.

The rates and regulations imposed upon railroads as a result of the act of 1920 certainly brought about the best results ever achieved in the history of transportation, evidenced by the results obtained in these three tabulations. The value of securities of railroads should have been at a peak in all history during the past 10 years. The ability of a corporation to pay its fixed charges and also declare substantial dividends are usually the two essentials which financial houses, brokers, stock and bond salesmen, and managers point to with pride when they try to entice the dollars of the public from the security of the savings banks and safe-deposit boxes and other conservative places of repose. The greatest improvement in the physical property of the railroads in their history occurred in the period 1920 to 1930.

From these figures and facts how clearly apparent it is that this emergency plea is specious!

EMERGENCY PERIOD NO TIME FOR PERMANENT LEGISLATION

This emergency period, when the railroads for a short time are suffering from the depression, is seized upon as the propitious time for passing this bill in their favor. Commissioner Lewis, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, expressed his disapproval of such legislation:

* * * should we be carried * * * to making changes in the law of a permanent character to apply to normal times * * * that we would not make in what we term normal times. (Hearings, p. 526.)

This problem should be more carefully studied. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should appoint a special committee to sit during the summer, call before it every possible authority and expert, and consider all the essential facts in the light of the common good as well as the special interests of the railroads. Then they would be able to recommend a safe and practical principle of rate making. Then, upon the arrival of better times, in the light of normal conditions, they should formulate permanent railway legislation.

The members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee itself had no time under the stress and strain of the extraordinary pressure of this session to give this matter sufficient consideration, and surely Members of Congress not on the committee in the closing days of this session can not be expected to give it the attention its importance demands. Are not the railroads taking advantage of this depression to get sympathy and more special favors? President Hoover has stated a few weeks ago, as reported in the press, after a careful survey of the railroad situation, that they are not so bad off as first appeared. He said:

I have held a number of conferences for survey of the railway situation and for determination of general policies in respect to the railroads. The elements in these conferences are the directors and heads of staff of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, members of the Interstate Commerce Commission dealing with these problems, and representatives of the Railway Credit Corporation.

Examination of the financial problem confronting the railroads shows that it is of smaller dimensions than has been generally believed or reported. (United States Daily, March 21, 1932.)

Why is this favoritism to be shown to one class of our people—the bond and stock holders of railroads? Was not agriculture the first to suffer in the fall of price levels? Has it not been for years in a "state of unprecedented collapse and prostration"?

RAILWAY INEFFICIENCY, EXTRAVAGANCE, AND BAD MANAGEMENT REWARDED

One of the specious arguments is that we must hasten to turn over these three hundred and sixty millions because recapture leads to extravagance. In the hearings Commissioner Eastman uses this as an argument for repeal. He quotes a statement from the 1919 report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the effect that the—prospect of sharing the surplus with the Government, or with labor, leads to extravagance in expenditures. (Hearings, p. 4.)

Just to show you what would happen if valuation were eliminated, I want to call your attention to one instance where the railroads have taken advantage of an antiquated classification of accounts—1907—by slipping in under operating expenses a billion dollars or more annually of superior roadbed improvement on which they escape recapture. They do this by a series of replacements, working up gradually to the highest grade of heavy rails and treated ties. Now, if it were not for the depression, they would be realizing on this investment—because no more replacement is needed—sufficiently to throw them into considerable recapture. Of course, they want the law repealed so that these profits will be their own. They have paid for these billions in improvements out of the people's money. I called for data from the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to this subterfuge. While the figure they furnished, $21,215,274—Exhibit III—relates to only 3 per cent of the mileage of the United States and covers about one-half the years since the transportation act was passed, yet on this basis the billion a year is not exaggerated if all facts were available and could be ascertained by laborious accounting methods. I have seen calculations from a reliable source which assert that if all other items of improvement were included which have slipped by under such swelled operating expenses they would amount not to one billion but to several billions for the period that recapture has been a law.

Other witnesses, attorneys of the special interests pleading for this bill, also urge extravagance as a reason for repealing the recapture clause. But are we to reward these railroads with the gift of 360 millions? Is that the remedy? Our United States Supreme Court in the Dayton-Goose Creek case, supra, said:

Those who earn more must hold one-half of the excess primarily to preserve their sound economic condition and avoid wasteful expenditures and unwise dividends.

It is easy to quote the testimony of competent men as to railroad extravagance over a long period. Back in 1910,

Justice Brandeis, then attorney for the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a rate-increase case said:

The railroads are wasting $1,000,000 a day. Were efficient methods of operation adopted, it would not be necessary for the transportation lines to increase rates. Instead, they could be decreased and at the same time the railroads could show a larger margin of profit than now is realized. (La Follette's Magazine, December 24, 1910.)

Mr. Brandeis, at that time, introduced testimony to prove the statement.
